

P E N G U I N

C L A S S I C S

Subhashitavali

An Anthology of Comic, Erotic and Other Verse

Penguin

SELECTED AND TRANSLATED FROM THE SANSKRIT BY A.N.D. HAKSAR

SUBHĀSHITĀVALI
An Anthology of Comic, Erotic and Other Verse

PENGUIN BOOKS

Contents

About the Author

Dedication

Introduction

Prologue

1. Salutations

2. Blessings

3. Poets and Poetry

4. Good People

5. Villains

6. Niggardliness

7. Nobility

8. Allegories from Nature

9. Allegories from the Animal World

10. Allegorical Miscellany

11. Love in Separation

12. Friends and Go-betweenes
13. Beautiful Women
14. Pride and Placation
15. The Seasons
16. Nightfall
17. Carousals
18. Love in Union
19. Miscellaneous Verses: 1
20. The Heroic Mode
21. Humour and Satire
22. Pen Pictures
23. Verses of Flattery
24. Verses of Counsel
25. On Dharma
26. The Iron Age of Kali
27. The Power of Past Deeds
28. Fate
29. Times of Trouble
30. On Being a Servant
31. Cravings

32. Transience

33. Derision of Lust

34. Regrets

35. Aspiration

36. Miscellaneous Verses: 2

37. Prayers

The Poets

Notes

Copyright Page

PENGUIN BOOKS

SUBHĀSHITĀVALI

Aditya Narayan Dhairyasheel Haksar was born in Gwalior and educated at the Doon School and the universities of Allahabad and Oxford. A well-known translator of Sanskrit classics, he has also had a distinguished career as a diplomat, serving as Indian high commissioner to Kenya and the Seychelles, minister to the United States, and ambassador to Portugal and Yugoslavia.

His translations from the Sanskrit include Hitopadeśa and Simhāsana Dvātrimśikā, both published as Penguin Classics, Jatakamala (with a foreword by the Dalai Lama) published by HarperCollins India, and the first-ever rendition of Madhavanala Katha, published by Roli Books as Madhav and Kama. He has also compiled A Treasury of Sanskrit Poetry, which was commissioned by the Indian Council for Cultural Relations.

P. M. S.

For Sharada, Vikram and Annika with love

Introduction

The Sanskrit word subhāshita can be translated literally as ‘well said’. It is often used for an epigrammatic stanza, the meaning or mood of which is complete in itself. Such a verse, also known as muktaka, could be an independent composition or part of a larger work. Its themes had a large variety, but its form was a constant two metric lines of equal weight, sometimes presented in four sections because of their length. At its best it combined brevity with a felicitous compression of thought or emotion. Many such verses passed into literature as maxims, proverbs or just memorable, quotable poetry.

Subhāshita verses are a characteristic and popular feature of classical Sanskrit literature. A recognized art form, they occur in the great epics, as a part of longer poems, and in plays and prose works. Much esteemed in cultured intercourse, they lent themselves to collection in anthologies. A number of these, compiled in various parts of the country during the last one thousand years, are extant.¹ Prominent among them is Subhāshitāvali, or a circlet of well-said verses, from which a selection is presented here in translation.

The contents of some subhāshita compilations are confined to a single theme or attributed to a single author.² Others bring together verses by numerous authors on a wide range of subjects. ³ Subhāshitāvali is of the second type. It is a collection of 3527 verse epigrams, grouped under 101 subject headings, and ascribed by name to 362 poets, apart from the many which are anonymous.

Academic opinion dates Subhāshitāvali to c. fifteenth century CE. ⁴ Its compiler was Vallabhadeva, who is described in some texts as a kāshmīraka, a person from Kashmir. ⁵ Little else is known about him but the anthology's Kashmiri connection is also evident from a number of authors and verses that feature in it. The former are noted in the appended list of poets and some of the verses, such as vv. 118, 243, 332 and 452, are included in the present selection. The subject of one (v. 425) is clearly Sultan Zainu'l Abidin (1420–1470), ⁶ a famous ruler of Kashmir who is known to have patronized Sanskrit letters. Thus, apart from the literary wealth of its contents, the compilation is also a pointer to the prevalence and extent of Sanskrit learning in medieval Kashmir.

The Subhāshitāvali verses span a period of at least 1500 years preceding the time of its compilation. Those extracted from the epics—Mahābhārata and Rāmāyana—are probably much older. The variety is immense. The anthology begins and ends on a devout note of divine invocations. In between, there are reflections on poets and poetry, on virtue and wickedness, nobility and meanness. There are numerous allegorical epigrams and verses on nature. Not unexpected, there is a rich collection of erotic poetry on all aspects of love, symbolic and actual, emotional as well as physical. This is followed by heroic, humorous and satiric verses, panegyrics and pen-pictures, and sage observations on worldly conduct. Finally there are musings on the human condition, on its transience and insignificance, and on moral duty and renunciation.

The tone of these epigrams ranges from the pious to the profane, the lyrical to the sententious, the earnest to the cynical, the elegant to the somewhat coarse. Some are drawn from famous works; others are known only from their presence in this collection. The authors, likewise, include celebrated poets like Vālmiki and Vyāsa, Kālidāsa and Bāṇa, as well as many who are no more than names.

In modern times, a manuscript of Subhāshitāvali was located by the British scholar Peter Peterson with Pandit Durga Prasad of Jaipur, who had studied it in Kashmir. Collating it with other manuscripts from the same land and elsewhere, Peterson edited and published the anthology's Sanskrit text in 1886 at Mumbai. Still the only critical recension in existence, it was reprinted in 1961 by the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute of Pune, and forms the basis for the present translation.

Though reputed in academic circles, Subhāshitāvali is little known to general readership. According to available records, it has never been translated into English, except for a few stanzas from its corpus included in some histories of Sanskrit literature or in some selections of Sanskrit poetry.⁷ Thus its treasure of epigrams remains largely inaccessible to modern readers. The present work attempts to ameliorate this situation by providing a representative sampling in contemporary English from the anthology's poetic cornucopia.

The selection presented here consists of 600 verses, or just under a fifth of the original. This size seemed optimal for publication, but some mention of the criteria of selection would still be appropriate. Within the limits of space, choice was based mainly on the consideration that translations of poetry should as far as possible be readable on their own, without requiring supplementary explanations about their intent and context. Thus, verses which rely for their impact on Sanskrit figures of speech and linguistic devices like paranomasia and alliteration, and others of the type vakrokti or oblique language, based on multiple meanings of words or suggestions, were largely left out.⁸ So too were most verses with mythological or other esoteric allusions which may be unfamiliar to the general reader. Some incomplete or unclear verses in the text were also excluded.

As for the actual selection, the effort was to make it representative of the original anthology as a whole by drawing verses from all its subject headings. Quality, translatability and, in some cases, historical interest were other considerations in choosing individual stanzas for translation. Additional attention was given to the hāsyā section of the original, which deals with humour and satire, as there are few English translations of this genre of Sanskrit verse.

The verses selected have been grouped under thirty-seven subject headings. Most of these correspond, in the same order, to the individual headings from the original's sūchipatra or table of contents, but there has been a measure of clubbing together in two instances, which requires further elaboration.

The first is the original's section on anyāpadeśa, or the allegorical epigram. The characteristics of this composition, to quote the American Sanskritist D.H.H. Ingalls, 'is that the person or situation expressly described serves to suggest some person or situation which is not mentioned, but to which the moral or the point of the verse applies'.⁹ For example, an epigram about the lion (v. 120) suggests that true excellence is innate and not dependent on any endorsement by others. The anthology has twenty subject headings under this section, describing specific animals and natural phenomena to suggest human qualities and situations. These have been combined here in three headings (8, 9 and 10) as allegories from nature, the animal world and a miscellany.

The second is the anthology's section on śringāra, or the erotic mode in its manifold aspects. The anthology has no less than fifty-two subject headings under this section, here combined into nine (11 to 19). The first of these (11) clubs four original headings on the pangs of separation suffered by lovers. The second (12) encompasses six from the original list about the trials faced by separated lovers, the questions and admonitions of friends, and the need to resort to messengers, often a girl who may well try to supplant the beloved in the lover's attentions.

The third heading (13) in the present selection combines eighteen from the original, including sixteen on the anatomy of feminine beauty. It was conventional to describe this in minute detail with traditional comparisons and the anthology has separate headings for various parts of the female body, from the forehead to the feet, and much that lies in between. These have been put together to present an overall picture without excessive and repetitive attention to minutiae.

The next combination (14) is of three original headings about the woman in love feeling offended, the placatory efforts of her lover and their exchanges. Following it, six original headings on the seasons are clubbed under one (15), and three on trysts at night under another single heading (16). The final combination (18) brings together seven original headings, from the exchange of endearments to the commencement, the climax and the end of love-making, with the verses selected ranging over the full erotic cycle. It is followed by a miscellany (19), the second of the three which are included in the original anthology.

The number of epigrams under humour and satire (21) is marginally the largest of all in this selection. The reason, as already mentioned, is that such verses have been little translated and remain comparatively unknown. Sanskrit literature, with the overall scholarly emphasis on its religious and philosophical content, is generally perceived as staid and serious. Its lighter, more flippant side has normally been overshadowed by great and solemn works. Here this side can be glimpsed in stanzas of jollity and wit, ribaldry and satire, harsh sarcasm and earthy bawdiness. Without condoning the sexism reflected in some of them, such verses have been included to enable subhāshita poetry to be seen in its totality.

The other subject headings of this selection need little comment. Each has a separate counterpart in the same order in the original, and most are self-explanatory. The word dharma (25), left as in the original, has multiple meanings, but its sense here is mainly moral duty and virtuous conduct. The word Kali (26) refers to the present age in Indian mythology, which is a time of extreme degeneration in contrast to the ages which preceded it. The next heading (27) which reads karma in the original draws on the concept that the present condition of all beings is determined by their past deeds. My translations have endeavoured to combine fidelity to the original verses with the requirements of modern English usage. If some are longer than the others it is because this was necessary for giving due expression to the ideas or images compressed in individual stanzas. Inflection, compounding and syntax in Sanskrit give greater scope for such compression than is possible in English, and the two or four lines of an original stanza sometime needed up to twelve in English to fully convey its meaning and intent. I have also used a variety of verse forms to reflect as far as possible some of the colour and flavour of the originals instead of literal renditions in prose.

The ascription of the verses presented here has been shown exactly as it occurs in the original. In many cases there is none. In others authors are named with or without titles or in both forms, for example Valmiki and Valmiki Muni. In a few cases the reference is to a work and not an author. Present scholarship shows that some of the compiler's ascriptions, perhaps based on the information available to him at the time, are not correct. These have been pointed out as far as possible in the notes. Seventeen verses in the original bear the name Vallabhadeva, but it is difficult to say with certainty which of them are by the compiler and which by an earlier writer with the same name from c. tenth-century Kashmir. Peterson assigned the two stanzas in the anthology's prologue (vv. 1 and 2) to the compiler, though his edited text gives them as anonymous.

Standard diacritics have been used in spelling the names of poets and the titles of texts, but otherwise confined largely to the indication of long vowels. Names in common usage, like Krishna and Shiva, have been spelt in this form which is easier to read. A brief background to the gods and goddesses mentioned in the verses is given at the beginning of the notes. Individual notes give information on specific verses, mainly their sources where known. The serial number of each verse, as given in the original anthology, has been shown at its right to facilitate reference to the Sanskrit text.

In preparing the notes and the details of the poets, I have relied mainly on Peterson's erudite annotations and some information on writers derived from D.D. Kosambi's introduction to the Sanskrit text of another anthology.¹⁰ I also benefited from consulting R. Malaviya's edition of the Peterson text (Varanasi, 1974) with notes and translations in Hindi, though his identification of our compiler with his tenth-century namesake needs further research for a definite conclusion.

Like any good anthology of poetry, Subhāshitāvali contains verses for all tastes and occasions. Some are of the highest quality, others may seem pedestrian by modern reckoning, but all are epigrammatic, clipped and to the point. It is not difficult to imagine that they were compiled to be read for pleasure and to be used for reference or quotation on appropriate occasions. I have enjoyed reading Vallabhadeva's original collection over the years, and am glad to share it with others through this translation.

I am grateful to V.K. Karthika, executive editor, Penguin India, for her ready response which encouraged me to undertake the present work. Some sample translations were seen earlier by my friends Ranjit Mathur and the late Ravi Dayal to whom I am indebted for the trouble they took to comment on them. Thanks are also due to Jaishree Ram Mohan for her meticulous copy-editing of my typescript. But most of all I would like to thank my wife, Priti, who read through most of the drafts and redrafts with enormous patience and always helpful criticism. For all her support in this and many other ways, no words of my gratitude can ever be adequate. Nor can they be for my mother, Subhadra, my first mentor in Sanskrit, whose birthday is today.

A.N.D.H.

Noida

5 September 2006

Prologue

1

All praise to Sharada,
the goddess enthroned
on white autumnal clouds, adept dispeller
of the pain existence brings in its wake. 1

2

Hail to the power
of human thought,
which needs no word
of any guru
to pierce through all the veils, revealing secrets supreme. 2

1. Salutations

3

I bow to that radiance, peaceful and still,
endless, unbound
by space and time,
which is the spirit,
and only known through self-awareness. 3

BHARTRIHARI

4

Reverence to Brahma, a flutter of whose eyes is sufficient cause for the world's creation and its dissolution. 4

PRAKĀŚAVARSHA

5

Bow to Vishnu,
the cause original
of the world's creation, its being and end.
He is the bridge across this endless course of life and death. 5

PUNYA

6

Bow to the great boar who saved the earth
with playful ease:
the mountain Meru
is but a speck beneath his hooves. 7

7

Bow to Shambhu,
his head caressed
by the crescent moon;
he is the rock
on which are built
the mansions of the triple world. 8

BHAṬṬA BĀṆA

8

Even the gods pray to him for realization of their wishes:
reverence to that Ganapati, remover of all obstacles. 9

9

Homage to Manmatha, churner of the mind,
who dwells in lovely women with round, uplifted bosoms, comely hips and languid gait. 10

VITĀ VRITTA

10

Homage to that light supreme which seems diverse in different forms
but in essence is the same, like gold in varied ornaments and water in lake or sea. 14

11

Whichever the worship
it is of him;
wherever the prayer,
it is to him;
whatever the form,
this or another,
it is but his.
Homage to him, to God. 19 12

Reverence to Shambhu, who transcends
the double state of is and is not into a wondrous third. 20 13

Bow to him who is the word
both occult and manifest, his glory revealed by the power of the independent mind. 21

14

Homage to Shambhu,
the wondrous and marvellous;
he is near, yet so far,
both easy and difficult to reach, hidden, and yet so manifest. 22 15

Be it Vishnu or Shiva, Brahma or the king of gods,
the sun, the moon, or the Buddha, or some other perfect being:
salute the one devoid of the poison of likes and dislikes
with their pain and delusion, adorned with every merit, and compassionate to all. 24 16

This verse by Svami Datta, the poet whose name marks the work called Chakrapāni Jaya, is here included
in his memory. 25

17

On his brow a dot of musk, on his breast the sacred jewel,
a fresh new pearl upon his nose ring,
a string of gems around his throat,

his limbs adorned with sandal paste,
the flute within his gleaming hands, ringed by milkmaids: glory be to the prince of cowherds, and victory. 27

2. Blessings

18

May Vishnu's arms protect you, strong as tree trunks,
dark as clouds,
givers of bounty,
reflecting the trace
of a leaf design
on Lakshmi's cheek. 29

HARSHADATTA

19

May the great boar's mighty tusk, which holds the earth as in a swing, pales the glow of the crescent moon,
and lights the depths of the nether world, protect and guard you all. 30

MĀTANGA DIVĀKARA

20

When Hari held up
the hill Govardhana,
all the cowherds
were overjoyed.
Listening to their songs of praise,

he remembered
his form as a boar,
with the earth uplifted on the crescent
of his tusk,
and smiled, embarrassed.
May that shy smile guard you all. 34

VIBHŪTIBALA

21

May that wind protect you all-- the breath of god in tortoise form, as he slept, his back caressed by the whirling peak of Mount Mandara which churned the sea in times gone by.
That breathing caused a tide to rise, and even now the ebb and flow of oceans does not ever cease. 36

22

May Krishna's smile protect you all as, eyes half shut, he drinks his fill from one breast, then grasps the other on which a drop has just appeared;
he beams as his chin is tickled, his little teeth gleaming like tiny drops of milk. 37

23

'While your brother's gone to play on the Yamuna's sandy banks,

Hari quickly drink your milk-- it is from the brindled cow and will make your hair grow long.'
The child, thus cozened by Yashoda, drinks half the milk, then stops to feel the hair upon his head, and beams.
May that Hari guard you all. 38

JĪVAKA

24

Yashoda looks at him with joy;
the milkmaids long and ardently;
with smiles the gods, respect, the sages;
young men with envy; kindly, the old;
his foes are fearful of his power,
and the earth besides itself,
as Krishna lifts the hill Govardhana:
may he protect you all. 39

BHAṬṬA CHÚLITAKA

25

'Mother, Krishna goes to play and swallows mud deliberately.'
'Krishna, is this true?' 'Says who?'
'Your brother.' 'Mama, it's a lie, look at my mouth.' 'Then open it.'
And within the mouth, a marvel, the mother sees the world entire!
May that Krishna guard you all. 40

CHANDAKA

26

'I stay devoted by your side and think of no one else.
Is it proper that you leave me and sport with all these mistresses?' Waking Hari with these words, then finding that the myriad images in the serpent's jewelled hoods are but her own reflections, Lakshmi smiles abashed.
May her smile protect you all. 41

27

They shame blue lotuses, look lovingly at devotees, are the focus of meditation for sages seeking merit.
They are a mine of beauty and gladden Lakshmi's heart:
may Hari's eyes and person rid you of sufferings in this scheme terrestrial. 43

AMRITADATTA

28

May Hari's conch shell bless you all,
the sound of which, when it is blown, rends enemy hearts, surpassing the roar of the seven seas churning within his belly. 47

29

In the van of battle, when Hari gazes at his discus, searing flames arise from it and spread in all directions,

a blazing image of the sun which is but his eye.
May that discus now dispel the circle of your enemies. 49

ANANDAVARDHANA

30

‘Mother!’ ‘Darling!’ ‘What is hidden in father’s hands he clasps together?’ ‘A tasty fruit, my child.’ ‘But why then does he not give it to me?’
‘Go and take it yourself!’
By his mother thus set up, when Guha pulled the hands apart and disturbed his meditation, Shambhu curbed his anger and burst out laughing.
May that laughter
protect and guard you all. 69

CHANDAKA

3. Poets and Poetry

31

What is the worth
of the poet's verse,
or the archer's dart,
which cannot set
the mind awirl
as it strikes the heart? 134

32

What is the use
of a poem's nectar, drenched by whose sweet flow of feeling the mind obtuse
can still not bloom? 136

ŚRI KALLAṬA

33

Some villains with no intellect to compose even two lines are ever ready to criticize the hard work of other poets. 140

BODHAKA

34

‘What fault can I find?’
With this thought in mind does a villain always start to scrutinize a poet’s art. 141

BHAṬṬA NĀRĀYAṆA

35

Some parrot poetry;
others have it inside
but are struck dumb;
rare is someone from whose heart, bubbling, flow graceful verses straight to the tongue. 143

ARCHITADEVA

36

The language of a master poet,
the pledge of wholesome speech observing,
is splendid like a woman chaste, untouched by vulgar word or meaning. 145

PRABHĀKARANANDA

37

Those great souls we should revere, their fame will last eternally, who have created poems, or whose praise is sung in poetry. 146 38

Even verses void of elegance, but timely read, are brilliant thought;
just as tasteless food is savoured by one with hunger overwrought. 150

VALLABHADEVA

39

The lotus grows in water
but blossoms with the sun;
the poet simply writes the poem, good people make it known. 154

BHADANTA RAVIGUPTA

40

With a verse stuck in his throat, the poet suffers as it were the last gasp of his very life till his eyes alight upon someone with understanding. 156

AMRITADATTA

41

The language of great poets has yet another, inner, sense, like a woman's grace, which is from her limbs a thing apart. 157

ANANDAVARDHANA

42

The poet's unsaid thought will only throb within some tender verse:
my homage to one who is silent, but responds with a thrill. 158

VIJJĀKĀ

43

Patronage of poets brings kudos and repute to kings, for poets the very same opens many doors to fame.
There is no patron better than a king for men of poetry, for kings too, there never can a helper like a poet be. 160

BHAṬṬA GOVINDASWAMI

44

Śrī Harsha gave a hundred measures of gold to Bāna, worthy poet, and a herd of rutting elephants too.
Where is all that wealth today?
But the multitude of verses that Bāna coined in Harsha's praise will, I hold, remain unblemished till the very end of time. 180

45

King Rama was extolled by Valmiki; Dharma's son by Vyasa; Śrī Vikrama, lord of men,
by Kalidasa the poet; Bhoja by Chittapa and Bilhana;

and Karna by Vidyapati.
These monarchs became famous because of great poets, not by the tumult
of their battle drums. 186

4. Good People

46

As clusters of wild flowers do,
the high-minded have but courses two:
to be borne on every brow, or perish on some forest bough. 201

RAVIGUPTA

47

For even those devoid of merit
the good always compassion bear:
the moon does not its lustre limit in lighting up the outcaste's lair. 225

48

The base will sin because they're cruel;
when terror strikes, so may the weak;
but the good, their lives at peril, can no more sin than can the sea roll o'er its natural boundary. 272

BHADANTA ŚŪRA

49

Can any burden be too great for those of fit and able state?
What destination is too far for those who enterprising are?
Which country is a foreign land for those with knowledge? And who can be the enemy of those who will speak lovingly? 313

50

They cannot stand to be obliged and will not tolerate sympathy, the high-minded are hard to help—they can never happy be. 202

51

The rising sun is red,
and also red at setting.
The great will look the same in good times and in bad. 220

52

Courage in calamity, forgiveness in victory,
in warfare chivalry,
eloquence in assembly,
love of reputation,
to scriptures devotion:
this is the true nature of men of noble stature. 267 53

Men of merit lasting long is intolerable even to fate:

the moon stays only for one night in its full and glorious state. 301

54

Experts may deride them or praise them to the sky, glory may crown them or just pass them by, death may be an age in coming or strike this very day:
the good will not hesitate from stepping on the righteous way. 278

55

The well-bred, even though enraged, will never scurrilous language use;
when pressed, the sugar cane exudes only sweetness in its juice.
The base, however, even served with every kind of skill, can in jest say things which hurt, cause quarrels and ill will. 277

56

One who has bathed
in the cool, bright stream of good people's company:
what does he need
of pilgrimage and penance, of rites and ceremony? 211

VALMIKI MUNI

57

The good do not give up their nature, struck even by calamity:
camphor, burning in the fire, will never fragrant cease to be. 296

58

What is so special
in kindness to one who has done you a favour or bears no ill will?
But one who has harmed you,
now caught for the crime:
the mind which is moved by compassion for him marks the best of good men. 256

59

Good people have hard hearts, I hold, for these cannot be pierced at all
by the sharp arrows
of wicked words. 212

TATHĀGATENDRA SIMHA

60

The best of men alone, not others, can bear the agitation of the mind caused by pain and suffering:
only the diamond can withstand friction on the mighty whetstone, not mere lumps of clay. 291

61

Those who merit understand find pleasure in its company, but those who are of it devoid can't with merit happy be.
Look, the bee comes from the forest to the lotus in the lake, but for the frog who lives beside it that flower does no difference make. 253

62

The tempest uproots not the grass softly bent to let it pass.
But mighty trees it will torment:
the great their wrath on equals vent. 261

63

Lamps illumine objects and some people are bright lamps of the family:
the brilliance of their merits casts lustre on even their forbears
who have long passed away. 258

AMRITAVARDHANA

5. Villains

64

When there are dirty things to do, wicked minds get sharper too, just as owls can better see the darker it begins to be 60.

65

With a villain, influential, mad for money, base and cruel, holding high office, O people, alas, where will you go? 339

KSHEMENDRA

66

As an elephant seeking shade, tired, rests beneath a tree and, after rest, that tree uproots:
so are the base with sanctuary. 354

67

‘My luck must have been in today, else why did he not do this earlier?
With me he has some selfish reason or he would favour his own kin.

This lecher fears I know his secret, if not, he would ignore me.' Vile minds will mostly think like this when something good is done for them. 361

KALHAṆA

68

The wise will with the wicked avoid both friendliness and enmity:
in licking too, as in its biting, the dog can cause one injury. 370

69

In the world there's nothing more laughable than that a wicked man describe a good person as evil. 371

70

Having forged the villain's tongue,
so lethal for all mankind, why did the Creator, needlessly, make poison, fire, weaponry? 376

71

Minds poisoned by the wicked cannot trust even the good:
the child, by hot milk scalded, blows even on his yoghurt. 390

72

It's easy to please the ignorant, and easier still the wise, but even God cannot placate one puffed up with a little knowledge. 393

BHARTRIHARI

73

Perfumed with musk and camphor, with sandalwood and incense, garlic still cannot give up its inauspicious odour—just like a base person his inborn nature. 415

74

To fight them hurts one's own reputation, to seek their friendship is a degradation;
considering both
and studying the score, the wise must merely the rabble ignore. 436

BHĀRAVI

75

Grind it hard, and you may get even oil from sand;
a person mad with thirst may drink water from a mirage; and travellers find the rabbit's horn if it is in their fate

but none can ever satisfy a fool who's obdurate. 447

BHARTRIHARI

76

Seeing in himself no merit, he wants others the same to be and, if not, laments that in this world no good men one can see.
He curses them and plots their ruin:
a person base, by destiny, is filled with hankerings to score on good people some victory. 452

VALLABHADEVA

77

A lion took the dear life of Panini, grammar's founder;
an elephant swiftly crushed to death Jaimini, the philosopher;
and Pingala, fount of prosody, was killed by sharks near the seashore:
minds stricken by ignorance have no use for merit's store. 458

6. Niggardliness

78

With the hoarder's money others will toy:
it is as honey
which some amass
and others enjoy. 474

79

What you give to charity and what you use from day to day, that I hold your wealth to be:
the rest for someone else will stay. 475

80

Money has these courses three—enjoyment, loss or charity;
one who will not spend or give,
with its loss is bound to live. 478

81

That villain, wealth, you guard so well, like life itself, in secret places, tormenting your very self,
will after death not follow you for even the five ritual paces. 489

Scared it will cost money, to friends he shows no amity.
 He won't accept their favours for fear they'll need reciprocity.
 Afraid of beggars, he will lie, he's never pleased with praise;
 terrified of wealth expending, how does a miser pass his days? 493

BHAṬṬA BĀṆA

7. Nobility

83

This is my brother, that is not—so do the small-minded see;
for the person large of heart, the world itself is a family. 498

BHAṬṬA UDBHAṬA

84

With constant rounds to life decreed, both birth and death are no surprises,
but truly born is one indeed, by whose birth the family rises. 500

85

For one blind to supplicate is passable: he cannot see the sneer upon the donor's face; but can anything more painful be than that even those who may have their eyes for favours pray. 503

86

What is the point of wealth which is no more than a wife in thrall, not like the lady of the street—enjoyable by all. 507

VIKRAMĀDITYA

87

The high-minded will let go of their very life if needs must be but not even the smallest favour seek from the enemy. 513

BHAŚCHU

88

Just as a body void of life is no more than a piece of wood, so too, I hold, is life without any feeling for another's good. 526

ŚANKUKA

89

One who reciprocates a favour, no matter how much, cannot be compared with him who rendered it in the beginning, initially:
the first act had no ulterior cause, the other an imitation was. 516

90

The brave and firm touch heights of glory, of wealth though they may have no aid;
no honour in the miser's story,
even though of money made.

Behold the lion's inborn glow, which massed merits do attain.
Can a dog that lustre show though it wear a golden chain? 535

91

A bed of grass, a seat of stone, shelter underneath a tree,
to drink, cool water, roots to eat,
of wild deer the company.
With all this easy, unsought wealth,
the forest has of faults but one:
supplicants are hard to find,
so scope for helping others none.
That is why we say,
there it is vain to stay. 540

ŚRĪ HARSHA

92

Fearing some impediment,
the base will not begin a work.
The middling start, but stop as soon as some obstacle does them irk.
But those of highest merit, though struck by trouble constantly,
will not abandon, even then,
the work they commenced willingly. 544

8. Allegories from Nature

93

Though borne by Shiva on his brow, the moon looks thin and on the wane to be dependent on another is indeed a dreadful strain. 552

94

To another quarter it may go, to sink in water, set in earth,
even plunge into a fire.
Yet can this lessen
the sun's great merit
in lighting up the world entire? 554

BHAṬṬA BHALLAṬA

95

The moon's splendour lasts only till sunrise;
once that sharp-rayed
effulgence has risen,
what is the difference between the moon and a speck of bright cloud? 555

PRAKĀŚADATTA

96

Great lights aplenty, even the moon, come up to ornament the sky, but none in truth does rise or set except the sun, whose rising is the day and setting night. 558

97

It bestrode the highest peak of Sumeru, lord of mountains, dispelled darkness and pervaded
this middle world entire,
yet that moon goes down the sky with its last few rays of light:
the rising high of even the great is followed by decline. 561

KĀLIDĀSA

98

Without the moon,
night has no glory,
and the moon no lustre
when night is gone;
why is it then
that their full union always happens
but once a month? 572

99

Even the radiant moon,
lord of healing herbs,
its body, nectar, its family, stars, loses its lustre in the sun's proximity:

who is not diminished on entering into another's orbit? 576

100

Because it's clean and clear by nature, its gems the ocean lets you see,
but do not therefore think the water is no deeper than your knee. 855

101

Gems surpassing moons in glow, the ocean casts to depths below,
and carries weeds upon its brow.
Though gems are gems, the weed a weed, by rulers are their rules decreed. 862

PUNYA

102

Its breakers, rising with the tide, may smash and scatter mountain rocks;
its sound may deafen all the quarters;
it may be vast; but can the ocean compare even with a pond in quenching the thirst of travellers, hot and weary with the sun? 880

103

The pure gems hidden inside are gone;
the water here is stinging brine, unpleasing and undrinkable;
one cannot even bathe in it for fear of sharks and serpents.

Traveller, has thirst made you mad that, for nothing, you run towards this wilderness called the ocean? 878

VRIDDHI

104

Look, how this lake, sole life support for travellers, is going dry!
Fie, O cloud, you flood for nothing the riverside market and obstruct good people there from passing by. 834

PRAKAŚAVARSHA

105

Frogs lay in crannies, as if dead, fish tossed and fainted in the mud,
and tortoises hid beneath the ground;
then, at that lake, a cloud unseasonal came and such a feat performed that, to their very necks submerged, wild elephants now the waters drink. 843

A SOUTHERNER

106

It does not merely thunder.
It rains on time, dispels fatigue with its showers, brings relief to fields parched in the heat, and gladly does all else auspicious that the heart desires.
Its form is dense and glistening,

its advent never fails:
may this good cloud grow. 851

107

Giving shelter, yielding fruit, of access easy, of pests free,
it exists just for the good of others, like a noble mind, this roadside tree. 791

108

Springtime does to all the forest foliage in abundance bring,
if the kareera tree stays leafless, what fault is it of Spring? 794

109

The very leaves whose clusters new provide the splendour of the tree, it discards when they grow old—for the base can this unusual be? 784

UPĀDHYĀYA UDAYA

110

O young champaka tree
with pleasing flowers fit to kiss the bloom upon a young girl's cheek, what is the use of blossoming here?
Give up the jest of florescence, this is a desert of vulgar people. 801

NARENDRA

111

O splendid tree, with wealth of fruit!
World famous giver of relief to the hot and hungry! From you all I somehow got was one small berry, half-eaten by birds, which had fallen down. 806

112

We ate sweet fruit and slept beneath leafy branches; drank of water your shade had cooled; felt fresh again and rested long with minds content.
But we are travellers, you a tree on this road. May we meet again. 831

113

That which is the crystal's merit itself becomes a fault:
it is so pure that it assumes even the shade of unclean things. 894

114

The conch shell sound which echoed that evening from a village temple was deep, auspicious, apposite, and pleasing to the ear.
But it was enhanced by the howls of a fat, mad dog with neck upraised:
the imitation pleased the villagers who drowned the sound with laughter. 915

JAYAVARDHANA

115

It has no water, trees or grass, it wearies out the travellers;
but far from repenting
that it cannot help them, the desert, rogue, incites them to drink from its mirages. 943

UCHYAMĀNĀNANDA

116

Can mango trees delight one here, with the weight of fruit bent down, or plantain's shade to stave off heat and champaka flowers' heady scent?
Here are just stumps of shami on which wild camels drool, why wander in this airless desert and risk your life, you fool? 950

BHALLAṬA

9. Allegories from the Animal World

117

The lion, which always slaked its thirst with fresh blood from the elephant's brow ripped by the daggers of its claws, today, alas, does beg for grass. 599

118

To Meer Shah, the baron lord, who wished to invade Kashmir's land, the potentate Shahabuddin sent the following word:
'Why do you, impetuous fawn, want to roam so carelessly?
Stop! This forest is not vacant.
In it still there is at home the lion whose great mane, a hood of hair, gleams with the elephant's blood.' 608–09

AMRITADATTA

119

His body, fangs and claws are small, and, O elephant, it is true,
this is just a lion's cub,
he can't compete with you.

But such an irrepressible seed the Creator in his heart did lay of valour, that it must regard even you as his rightful prey. 615

ANANDAVARDHANA

120

The lion's crowning, formally, is never in the forest done.
Self-evident his sovereignty, his power by his valour won. 581

121

Who is to blame, what can we do,
for this great anamoly?
The elephant's price in millions stands, the lion's can't a penny be. 585

ŚRI MUKTĀPĪḌA

122

Do not fidget, elephant-calf, mind your manners, bow your head!
This goad, curved like the lion's claw is too heavy to be used on you. 622

BĀṆA BHATṬA

123

Enjoy yourself, eat lotuses, bathe in mountain waterfalls,
your limbs carressed by loving mates;

but, elephant, give up any wish to battle with the lord of beasts. 623

ANANDAVARDHANA

124

This elephant had gone berserk, caused consternation all around;
how has it then been controlled by a little mahout boy who climbed onto his head? 624

PRAKĀŚAVARSHA

125

The dog will wag its tail, and go grovelling down, his belly show before his feeder; but the brave elephant gazes long and grave at the hand which offers bread, and must be coaxed, before he's fed. 641

126

O proud elephant, do not keep harking back with half-closed eyes to those hillside forest groves;
now give up pride, accept the present,
for it is hard to control fate. 644

JALHANA

127

This doe lies here, unbound but still,
with an open wound, and a dart within,

not quite dead though life is ebbing:
and her stag is on the hill. 647

128

All sides roped in, the water poisoned, nets on the ground, the forest burning,
and hunters chase it, bow in hand, where can this king stag find refuge? 648

MUKTĀPIṬA

129

The deer bypassed all pitfalls.
It broke the net and smashed the snare, ran far out of the spreading flames in the wood, with swift leaps dodging the hunters' arrows as it fled;
but then it fell inside a well.
When fate is set against you, what can all the effort do? 655

130

Deer, go quickly! Leave this place!
Why do you stop and turn your face,
looking back continually?
The fluttering of your eyes will not melt even a bit these wretched hunters, their hearts are hardened totally. 649

131

Not your dance,
a feast for the eyes,
nor your call,
elixir for the ears,

not even your tail,
a rainbow of colours—
nothing will satisfy the cat except, O peacock, to kill you. 683

132

Brother koel, cease your song, its music has no value now, be quiet, sit inside some hollow by heaps of fallen leaves concealed;
it is no more the feast of spring,
this, O friend, is winter time, now the groves in the parks are full of flocks of harshly cawing crows. 722

133

Here crickets chirp, there ravens crow, here hooting cranes, there chattering apes, yonder dreadful howls of jackals:
it's providence. How can the koel, young and timid, raise its voice? 723

134

Standing on one stem-like leg the aged crane retracts its neck to give to all the little fish the illusion of a lily bloom. 758

VRIDDHI

135

He can't sing sweetly like the koel, nor has the swan's voluptuous gait or the peacock's painted feathers:

even so the crane has weight—and that is his hypocritical state. 761

ŚRI JAYAVARDHANA

136

The same in colour and in plumage, black, in a koels' gathering who would know it is a crow if it did not try to sing? 764

VĀLMIKI

137

Shooing off the koel,
the crow enjoys the mango fruit;
driving out the kingly parrot,
the osprey eats the pomegranate;
the owl expels the peacock from the treetop, and sleeps there happily with its partner.
The eagle having gone away, in the forest all is wrong today. 773

138

It means the sun or even the moon,
the name 'Illuminant of the Sky':
to an insect it was given by someone pleased with the firefly. 777

139

'The moon will set
and the stars' glory fade, the gloom-dispelling

lamps go out,
when all is dark,
I'll light it up.'
Sir firefly,
this is unlikely. 782

140

Having quaffed the lily's treasure, there itself the youthful bee aspires to the mimosa bud;
in this wicked honey-licker is there any loyalty? 725

141

Amuse your fickle heart, O bee, in other vines whose flowers can all your rough caresses share.
Why squeeze and crush before its time
the young bud of the jasmine, still tender and of pollen bare? 735

VIKAṬANITAMBĀ

142

He drank of nectar, as he pleased, from the fragrant saffron bud, spent the moonlit nights of autumn within the lotus flower's womb, and roamed amidst the elephants, their temples stained with ichor flow:
how can this bee feel satisfied on a dry kareera tree? 749

143

Kingly swan, why have you come?
Be quick, depart before it's dawn.
Here fools will take you for a crane—they think the crane to be a swan. 704

10. Allegorical Miscellany

144

To carry loads it is not able, nor can it serve the ploughman's need,
however the temple bull does splendidly when at his feed. 953

145

Seated in his own abode, the crocodile can even drown an elephant, but on leaving it a mere dog can bring him down. 954

146

It's better to be trampled by the lion, on its track with noble tail and bristling mane, than climb upon a jackal's back. 955

147

No matter where they go, the deer can pass their days and live on grass of any kind;
but for lions, who eat elephants they hunt themselves, a livelihood is very hard to find. 957

BHAṬṬĀRKA

148

The full moon of an autumn night, dispelling dark with myriad rays, cannot ever match the light of the sun, even on cloudy days. 965

VIDYĀDHIPATI

149

Behold the scarecrow the farmer made to look like him and guard the grain:
as it cannot move, the beasts are bound to lose fear and eat the crops again. 984

150

Resting on her rounded hip, held tight within her graceful arms, pressed hard by the maiden's breasts, the pitcher now enjoys the fruit of being fired by the flames of cow dung in the potter's kiln. 994

AMRITAVARDHANA

151

From birth insignificant, it never counted for anything, was only trampled underfoot into the ground each day.
Now see, friend, lifted to the skies by a fickle wind, this very dust sits on hillcrests and crowns of kings. 1011

We put up with snakes
on the sandal tree:
how can grace
unguarded be?
Tell us khadira,
is it to protect your elegance that these thorns you collect? 798

BHALLATA

11. Love in Separation

153

You brush aside my hand and leave,
of strength is this a great display?
I would reckon you a man
if from my heart you got away. 1041

154

When you are not here,
I long to see you;
when you are, I fear
we will be parted.
It is no comfort—
to see you or not. 1043

155

She did not hold him by the cloak, or bar the doorway with her arms,
fall at his feet or ask he stay:
but when on a dark and cloudy day her husband was about to leave, she blocked his path with streams of tears. 1057

156

If it's certain you must go, why then the hurry, at least wait for some more moments, while I gaze upon your face.

Living in this world is like water flowing down the drain, who knows if we will meet again. 1059

157

She listened to his words, 'I'm going,' and 'Try to manage the house,' took note even of his return, but hearing 'Don't be sad,' she looked at her husband's face and sighed and gazed at the baby at her breast. 1064

DHĪRANĀGA

158

I may have decided to go, but how can I tell, unfeelingly,
one who is my very life?
And even telling, and then watching her face stream with tears, and still going: fie upon this craving for a bit of money, such as mine. 1050

MORIKĀ

159

Stop, O friend, stop fanning me with leaves of lotus and of palm, the fire in my heart may just suddenly erupt in flames. 1070

160

I do not know how to weep, grieving too, I do not know,
these tears keep falling on their own,
I do not weep—it's truly so. 1105

161

Once again the day has passed of your heartless father's return, darkness now spreads on the road, come, little son, let's go to sleep. 1106

162

O heart be still,
why suffer too,
the one you love
does not love you. 1111

163

The tie of love is gone,
the heart's assurance too, tender feelings spent,
he's just another man.
But, thinking of the past,
dear friend, I know not why my heart just does not shatter into a hundred pieces. 1141

VIJJĀKĀ

164

'This is black.' 'It's black, my dear.'
'Indeed it's white.' 'And why not?'
'We will go.' 'Then let us go.'
'Enough of going.' 'So be it.'

Thus he always went along with my preference in the past, but now he goes with someone else.
Friend, who can ever know a man? 1138

165

Somehow, in a play of pique,
I told him to get out, and he,
hard-hearted, left the bed abruptly and just walked away.
But my shameless heart still yearns for that callous spoiler of our love, O good friend, what shall I do? 1143

166

‘You simple girl, do you intend to be so naive all the time?
Compose yourself and mind your honour, don’t be artless with your lover.’ Thus advised by friends, the maid with a timorous look replies, ‘Hush! Softly! My life’s lord may hear you, he is here within my heart.’ 1161

AMARUKA

167

I am now by pride afflicted, and cannot ever go to him;
nor have I clever friends who can take me there by force or whim.
He too is proud, and will not come on his own to look for me.

Time passes thus, and life is short,
Mother, I am sick with worry. 1160

168

One thing which he always liked was to look at me.
He had no care for any other,
I was his life's support.
Now, look friends, I do not even have any news of him but live on, it is so strange to talk about my grief. 1155

169

Go, wind, where my darling is,
touch her, come back, touch me too;
even this is a lot for lovers,
it will keep me living. 1190

VĀLMIKI MUNI

170

For a lover it's a lot to know, and not at all of little worth, that I and that lovely legged girl stand upon the selfsame earth. 1191

VĀLMIKI MUNI

171

She would not e'en a garland wear lest it should then interfere in our lying close together:

but now between us forests lie, rivers wide and mountains high. 1192

VĀLMIKI MUNI

172

Raising up, O just a little,
that face as lovely as a lotus—when will I drink from it again that incomparable elixir? 1194

VĀLMIKI MUNI

173

Her hips were round,
her movement languid,
even as she walked away,
she stepped inside my heart. 1205

ŚRI HARSHADEVA

174

The sage's word is true indeed, that all the world is transitory:
else of parting from that doe-eyed girl who could bear the agony? 1198

175

Even with my love-sick mind,
my sight has divine grace:
sitting here I see my love who is in another place! 1208

DHAIRYAMITRA

176

To think of her gives fever,
to see her causes lunacy, to touch her puts one in a swoon, how can she my sweetheart be? 1225

177

If she, my love of graceful limbs, lives within my heart,
how is it that it feels empty, of fate is this a part? 1241

178

If I keep thinking of that girl, what hope is there that I'll survive?
And if I live, forgetting her, what is the point of staying alive? 1251

DĪPAKA

179

In the forest of her body, in secret hills which are her breasts,
do not wander, O my mind, there love the bandit lies in wait. 1256

180

Renunciation negates all ills—this seems to be a pack of lies, all my ills began when I renounced that girl with innocent eyes. 1271

ŚŪDRAKA

181

She covered her lips
with her fingers again
as she timidly warned me that I should refrain.
I lifted her face,
she turned to my shoulder,
I do not know why
I did not then kiss her. 1273

KĀLIDĀSA

182

Even today,
I remember her face,
pale, and brushed
by swinging earrings, with beads of sweat
appearing like pearls
in love's exertion,
as my darling strove
to act the man. 1291

BILHAṆA

183

I do not know who will be fated to enjoy this faultless beauty, an unsmelt flower, a bud unpicked, an unpierced pearl, fresh honey whose flavour none has tasted. 1332

KĀLIDĀSA

184

She grieves in my sorrow,
thrills in my joy,
suffers my anguish,
and speaks sane words
when mine are incensed.
She knows the times,
is clever in speech,
delights in my praise.
Noble adviser, comrade and helper,
my wife is many things rolled in one. 1353

BHĀSA

185

She is in the bloom of youth,
my mind has gone haywire:
her limbs are full of loveliness, in mine there spreads a fire. 1212

AMARUKA

186

I saw my angry sweetheart
in a dream today.
'Do not touch me!' she exclaimed in tears, about to go away.
As I began assuring her with sweet words and an embrace deep, just then, O friend, a wicked fate robbed me of my sleep. 1362

NIDRĀDARIDRA

12. Friends and Go-betweens

187

You simple girl, why try to hide the pain of parting from your lover by holding back your tears?
Your pillow, drenched night after night, now put out to dry, tells all. 1095

188

Your face is pale, eyes bright with tears, limbs gaunt, gait dull, composure gone.
Don't be coy, you foolish girl,
why not tell me, your best friend,
the truth of what, within the hour, has brought you to this pass? 1096

189

Your gaze is languid, soft with love, you shut your eyes repeatedly and open them for just a moment to stare, or shyly dart a glance full of some inner feeling.
Tell me, young miss, who is he,
that lucky man you are looking at? 1098

190

If that heartless man has gone, ignoring these flashing eyes and the girdle clinging to your hips, it's he who is the loser. 1168

191

When your sweetheart came, you did not greet him straightaway and long, nor put your arms around him and speak sweetly words dripping with love or, gathered to your upthrust bosom, hold him in a deep embrace:
you simpleton, you have been let down by your own ineptness. 1173

RATNAMITRA

192

What did you get by being so fickle and self-willed?
He came to your house,
fell at your feet so lovingly,
and you ignored him!
Now you'll never be happy and weep lifelong reaping the fruit of anger. 1176

AMARUKA

193

True, today is Tuesday, not suitable for you;
even so, messenger, go,
a sufferer cannot wait. 1179

194

Good times are as waves on water, youth is but a moment's span,
life is frail—an autumn cloud, go quick, messenger, tell him this. 1180 195

Messenger, it's getting dark, that rake is young, you just a girl,
the message secret, the place a wood,
the spring breeze sets all minds awirl.
Still, go, and may the meeting spell good news for me. God guard you well. 1188

ŚĪLĀ BHATṬĀRIKĀ

196

'Where is the question
of any quarrel?
She lives for you,
her eyes on the door,
head bowed on hand.'
Such words, repeated
to the lover,
give him new pleasure
every time. 1182

BHĀRAVĪ

197

Do not get concerned, or worry that she is so young, thin and delicate.
Have you ever seen a vine shed flowers when a bee alights?

So, sir, in some lonely spot, show no mercy, kiss her hard:
the sugar-cane stem will never yield its juice if handled softly. 1401

VIKAṬANITAMBĀ

198

O hard of heart, she could not bear the pangs of separation, and as she gave up life, has sent this final message meant for you:
'A child to give me funeral water, luckless I leave just one daughter.
Do not give her off in marriage to one engrossed in work abroad.' 1403

BRAHMAYAŚASVĀMIN

199

Wayfarer, brother, go home quickly,
I have seen your darling there:
eager for some word of you she meets each traveller on the road, but, choked with tears, she cannot speak and only sighs escape her lips as, head bent low, she weeps and weeps. 1409

200

Pure cheek on palm,
eyes on the road,
her heart with you:
since long it has been thus,
how could she

have time to stand on dignity? 1381

VARARUCHI

201

Her hot sighs evoke the summer;
a flow of tears, the monsoon time;
pale and sunken breasts, the autumn;
the two winters, her face sublime, now trembling, now a fading lotus;
then beads of sweat come like spring days.
In missing you, it is a marvel, all the seasons she displays. 1406

HARIGANA

202 ‘Messenger, did you go?’ ‘I did, my lady, to that libertine.’ ‘Did you see him long? What was he doing?’ ‘He was just amusing himself, playing on the vina.’ ‘Fortune’s made him proud. What did he say?’ ‘He did not speak at all.’

‘Because of pride?’ ‘No, choked by tears.’
‘The rogue! Those are his tricky ways.’ 1424

203

Messenger, your face and bosom, with your hand why cover more?
Lips and breasts, like soldiers brave, look best while bearing marks of war. 1428

204

Why talk about it more, messenger?
For my work's accomplishment you gave of even your own flesh, what to say of other things? 1434

VARARUCHI

205

The other night, in course of love, somehow he stole a cloak of mine.
You have now retrieved it by giving away your own!
Can any messenger be as clever as you in covering up a slip? 1437

BĪJAKA

206

'Why do you pant?' 'I came back fast.'
'What makes you thrill?' 'He has agreed.'
'Your hair's undone.' 'I fell at his feet.'
'Your skirt knot too!' 'From going and coming.'
'There's sweat on your face.' 'I went in the heat.'
'You seem worn out.' 'I talked a lot.'
'But, what do you have to say, messenger, of your lips, which seem to look like faded lotus buds?' 1440

ŚILĀ BHATṬĀRIKĀ

207

Your hair is mussed, your cheeks are pink,
all your frame is trembling too.
It does seem to me, my lady, that my lover has beaten you! 1435

JAYAMĀDHAVA

208

Lover, you deserve this paragon, and she deserves you equally—the moon shines not without the night, and a moonless night must dismal be. 1396

MORIKĀ

13. Beautiful Women

209

In this worthless scheme of things the treasure she will always be—a fawn-eyed girl of languid grace to whom love comes spontaneously. 1453

210

The dark-eyed maiden's wavy tresses stream between her rounded breasts like a line of bees on their way to the heart, suffused with the nectar of a freshly blooming lotus. 1484

PUNYA

211

That beauty spot upon your forehead glitters like an arrow's blade;
fixing it on those archéd eyebrows, miss, who are you about to slay? 1488

212

How has that pair of dark-blue lilies blossomed on your lotus face?

Is this a portent of some trouble which will of good men leave no trace? 1492

213

Though flowers growing in a flower is neither seen nor heard of ever, miss, on the lotus of your face of lilies blue I see a brace. 1495

214

Your lower lip, with coral glow, is a desert trail, fair maid, whose heart will it not overcome with thirst and longing for a drink? 1507

215

Nectar, no doubt, has its flavour;
honey too; what can one say, fresh mango juice is also sweet;
but a discriminating person may sit in judgement and pronounce, even once, if indeed there is any taste more luscious than of the lips of one's beloved here. 1511

216

It cannot make itself resemble my love's sweet face in any way:
the moon expands and then reduces its orb repeatedly, to this day. 1517

ŚRI HARSHA

217

Her full breasts are lotus blooms, dark nipples like two bees upon them,
the stem, a hair line to the navel, points to the treasure trove below. 1545

218

O you rash daredevil girl!
Why go whirling round and round?
Sit down! Or else your waist will snap with the swirling of your breasts. 1547

VIKAṬANITAMBĀ

14. Pride and Placation

219

I frown, I no more look for him, speak little, and shroud myself with a cloak. The mind alone wanders, anguished. But who can divine that? So, hurry, fetch the man I love, to see how I have been wounded. 1579

220

Even as I frown, the eyes search for him more eagerly.
I keep silent, still a smile flits across this wretched face.
The mind I've steeled, but even so my body bristles by itself.
When I see him, how indeed, will I stand upon this pride? 1580

BHADANTA ĀROGYA

221

My wayward eyes may flit and roam, this wretched girdle slip, this bodice rip with the heaving of my breasts, but, friend, I'll never speak again to that rogue of a lover, that is if with wounded pride my heart does not just then burst apart. 1575

AMARUKA

222

When my lover at last appeared,
after long, and suddenly, deliberately I shut my eyes and did not speak as he would like.
But my arms did not obey me.
They bristled and embraced him hard as, by practice, they were wont.
Mother, what then could I do? 1582

223

As he approached her
she got up in welcome, leaving no chance for their sitting together; avoided his embrace
on the pretext of going to fetch him a betel leaf;
and did not converse,
keeping busy with servants
in the vicinity.
She was thus courteous
to her lover, but clever enough, nevertheless,
to show her displeasure. 1583

PULINA

224

She did not ignore courtesy, frown, be terse or contrary,
nor say anything impolite, but when her lover clasped her in a close embrace, her eyes welled up with tears and made her anger known. 1587

DHARMAKĪRTI

225

You hold my life
like a ball in your hand;
how long, fair maid,
do you want this game
of changing moods
to continue? 1593

ŚAŚIVARDHANA

226

‘Beautiful, give up this pride.
Look at me, I’m at your feet.
You’ve never been so cross before.’
By her husband thus addressed, she cast a glance from half-closed eyes, shed many tears, said not a word. 1600

227

Your eyes he made of lilies blue, your face of lotus flowers, your teeth of jasmine buds, your lips of young and fresh red shoots, and your limbs of champaka blooms.

With all this, darling, how could God possibly make your heart of stone? 1610

228

The night is almost past,
the crescent moon is turning pale,
the lamp is flickering, as if it also wants to fall asleep.
Though I have begged forgiveness you are still enraged.
By nearness to your breasts, you minx,
has your heart also turned hard? 1612

BĀṆA BHATṬA

229

O you lovely legged girl,
why do you hide and peep?
Look at your sweetheart openly:
water drunk in droplets dripping from a blade of grass will never quench your thirst. 1596

VRISHṆIGUPTA

230

‘Girl!’ ‘My lord,’ ‘Stop being angry.’
‘What have I done in anger?’
‘You’re cross with me.’ ‘It’s not your fault, all the faults are only mine.’
‘Then why weep and choke with sobs?’
‘In front of whom do I do so?’
‘Why, me.’ ‘And who am I to you?’
‘My love.’ ‘I’m not, and so I weep.’ 1614

231

O proud beauty, hard of heart, stop being angry! It ruins pleasure, is wrong, when youth and being together are so fleeting. Death counts each passing day, and love is not complete without a quarrel! 1619

BHĀSA

232

In the beginning were those days when you and I were one.
 Then you, the lover, I became simply a mistress losing hope.
 Now you are husband, I the spouse, what more is there to say?
 My spirits turned as hard as rock, and this the fruit I reap today. 1622

233

‘It is as you say, my lady,
 all the faults are always mine,
 though what offence, O lotus-eyes, can there ever be from husbands?
 Yet here I am, with folded hands, punish your slave at will.’
 ‘When a slave has crimes committed can there be scope for pardon still?’ 1631

234

Take a field of powdered sugar, on which clouds have honey rained, the seedlings then manure with candy and irrigate with juice of grapes:
if that bore fruit, its superlative sweetness would then match your voice. 1639

235

Kama struck me with his arrows,
I did not care as I recalled you to be my healing balm;
nor did separation's fire burn me, as the hope of meeting you was with me as a charm;
I passed those days in making wonderful resolves withal—you know them as you're in my heart, a witness to them all. 1634

ŚŪRAVARMAN

15. The Seasons

Spring

236

This hum is not a swarm of bees, from inebriety its sweet note born:
it is the sound of Kama's bow,
in this season being drawn. 1644

BHĀMAHA

237

Embracing the mango blossom the bee kisses it with much ado as a lover would his sweetheart, thrilled at meeting her anew. 1647

238

In the woodland, everywhere, the flame of the forest trees have shed all their leaves, their branches bent with flowers bright as blazing fires, and the earth gleams in the spring like a new bride in red attire. 1678

KĀLIDĀSA

239

The koel's call does now proclaim at the love god's own command:
'Travellers, do not leave your homes,
give up thoughts of going away;
proud ladies, do not be so difficult,
why get angry with your lovers?
For spring, which can consume the lives of parted couples, has arrived.' 1689

Summer

240

The lane is empty and deserted in the searing heat of summer, but for the couple there, absorbed in talking only with each other, the sun shines like the moon. 1693

241

Fearing the unbearable heat of the sun, now at its zenith, shadows too, in search of shade, have withdrawn beneath the tree. 1699

ŚRIMAD AVANTIVARMAN

242

Troubled by the sun's hot rays, scorched by the pathway's burning sand, panting, uncoiled, hood contracted,
the snake now rests beneath the peacock. 1703

243

To feel the cool breeze on a body covered with drops of perspiration;
to taste the water, cold and clear,
in a mouth all parched with thirst;
after travelling far, to rest
the tired limbs beneath the shade:
blessed indeed is one who spends the summer wandering in Kashmir. 1710

BHAṬṬA BĀṆA

244

If you wish to get home quickly, having pined each day to see your dear wife with her swinging hairbraid, then, friend, though you may thirsty be,
from that well for drinking water it's better you keep far away, for the artless, languid glances of the girl who tends it get travellers there to stay. 1712

245

Seeing the forest all around inhospitable, as if on fire, and fearful of the heat, the buffalo drinks acrid water from the pond boiling in the midday sun, and tries to curl its body so as to shelter in its own shadow. 1706

MĀTRISHENĀ

The Rains

246

O cloud! Thunder, rain, or throw bolts of lightning down below!
Men on their way their girls to meet do not think of cold or heat. 1724

247

The sky is like a madman,
it dances with arms of lightning, laughs with a flight of cranes and weeps with streams of rain. 1725

248

Mountain peaks, with water streaming from rainbow clouds which rest on them, seem like rutting elephants draped in cloaks of many colours. 1728

VIŚĀKHADEVA

249

Dark clouds above
and sloping hills
where peacocks dance,
the ground below
all white with new blooms, where can the traveller rest his gaze? 1744

BHARTRIHARI

250

The air I breathe is bitter with the scent of mountain jasmine, I hear the clouds thundering, have spent night after night on a lonely bed
trying in vain to sleep, covered the walls with signs to mark the passage of time, but you never come and this life is hard to end. 1764

251

With sky as pit, and lightning's fire, Kama performs the ceremony for causing turmoil in the hearts of women parted from their lovers:
the thunder is his litany. 1780

ŚRI RĀJĀNAKA ŚUGA

252

The sky is dark with clouds, dark as the smoke from fires, the ground is spread with grass sprouting fresh, dark green;
the time is indeed suited for making love, it comes when for separated couples the one refuge is death. 1760

CHIĀKA

253

Let clouds thunder
and stream rain,

lightning flash,
winds blow their coldest;
I have an antedote
to stave off fear,
it is my sweetheart
reclining on my chest. 1790

Autumn

254

In autumn, as their flow recedes, rivers gradually reveal their sandy banks, like girls still shy of making love, the inner thigh. 1792

VĀLMIKI

255

Autumn comes, a bride in white,
her visage radiant as the moon,
with eyes like petals of blue lilies,
and a wealth of lotus flowers,
a wild goose by her side—good fortune's goddess, praised in song. 1818

MAHĀMANUSHYA

256

With rich grain and blooming lotus, lucid waters, song of cranes,
the moon's bright disc, the sky's expanse, autumn, and its many faces, win the hearts of all mankind. 1823

257

The sun is sharp and hot,
like the base with new wealth.
The deer shed horns
like an ingrate his friends.
The waters grow limpid
like the mind of a sage, and mud starts drying up like a poor man who's lustful. 1821

BHĀSA

Rice stalks, heavy now with grain, are slowly bending down their heads as if to smell the lotus flowers growing beside them in the field. 1805

VARARUCHI

Early Winter

'She is the sweetheart
of the sun, my enemy':
and the frost, in anger, has blighted the lily. 1830

BILHAṆA

O winter, as you pass, for me two things will memorable prove:

the water freezing on its own, and nights ideal for making love. 1836

261

In a little grass cottage, beside the barley field,
on a bed of fresh-cut straw, sleep the farmer couple;
so well protected are they
by the warmth of her breasts that the cold keeps far away. 1840

KAMALĀYUDHA

Late Winter

262

The door of the room shut tight,
a fire burning by the bed,
an ample quilt to cover you,
in your arms a loving spouse:
to a person who sleeps thus,
what can the snowfall do? 1853

BĀṆA

263

It was dusk. At first the traveller sat by a public bonfire and,
not caring if he got scorched, warmed himself to heart's content.
Then, partly covered with a rag, he slept beneath the thatched roof in a corner of the shrine of the village goddess, till a wind, laden with snowflakes, drove him to another corner. 1857

16. Nightfall

264

The sun sinks fast, as if afraid of angry glares by lovelorn women who await with trembling lips this signal for nocturnal trysts. 1897

NARENDRA

265

Pure or sullied, firm or fickle, straight or curved—each quality is by darkness made the same;
evil's force, it is a shame, overwhelms variety. 1901

KĀLIDĀSA

266

The sun, in setting, seems to say, its last ray on the lily's head:
'I go, fair one, my time is up.
Sleep, tomorrow I will come to awaken you myself.' 1908

ŚRĪ HARSHADEVA

267

The sharp-rayed sun, some people say, sinks in the sea at the end of day;
it goes to light another world—this is what some others hold;
and yet others do proclaim,
it merges with some cosmic flame.
But all of this seems just a lie—it has no witness standing by.
As for me, I'm sure, dear friend, that the sun, when day does end, within some maiden's heart must stay to burn it while her lover's away. 1902

INDULEKHĀ

268

As the sun sets in the western hills, a full moon rises on the crest of the mountain in the east:
the glory of the evening sky resembles Hara dancing, with two copper cymbals in his hands. 1909

269

Moonlight is maddening,
it turns the world upon its head:
the cat licks it in the cup like milk;
the elephant reaches for the beams filtering through leaf-laden trees, mistaking them for tender shoots;
and the girl thinks it's her garment on the bed, at love's end. 1994

BHĀSA

270

Parting the dark mass of her hair with the fingers of his rays, closing the lotus blooms, her eyes, the moon kisses the face of Night. 1963

KĀLIDĀSA

271

That lily's life were passed in vain, which did not the moon behold;
the moon's existence fruitless too, if it did not ever see the lily waken and unfold. 1964

BILHAṆA AND THE PRINCESS

272

That ancient poet is a fool.
A curse upon his poetry which compares a woman's face with the moon. How can that be?
The eyebrows arched, the sidelong glance, the rage, the laughter full of glee—in the moon with just its rabbit, where can anyone ever see? 1977

273

Moon-faced girl, look at the moon, an earring for the maiden, night,
a lotus petal in sky's lake,
a flint for honing Kama's arrow. 1984

274

Trees look like royal parasols, hills like the snowy Mount Kailasa, mud as curds, as milk the sea, vines like pearl strings, fruit like shells:
all the land's expanse is turned white with the rising of the moon. 2002

BHAṬṬA TRIVIKRAMA

275

The road is dark, she trembles so,
her lover stole her heart away, how will you lead her to his house,
Kama, can you ever say? 1936

276

Midnight, dark and cloudy skies,
the city lanes deserted,
the husband gone to foreign lands, give joy supreme to a wanton. 1937

277

‘Where are you going, pretty maid, in this dark of midnight?’ ‘Where lives my lover, dear to me even more than my life.’
‘Are you not afraid, my girl, of setting forth alone?’
‘A warrior with his feathered arrows, Madana goes with me.’ 1946

AMARUKA

278

The necklace glitters on your breast,
the girdle chimes around your hips,
and anklets tinkle on your feet;
when you are going out to meet your lover with so much fanfare, why do you, O innocent maid cast furtive glances everywhere? 1947

ARGAṬA

17. Carousals

279

She, who was cross
with her faithless lover and would not relent
when he fell at her feet,
is now, with wine,
no more fastidious,
and satisfies him
as she did before. 2014

NAGNAJITA

280

The moon could not compete with the glow on this beauty's face and, ashamed, it's gone to swim within her wine-filled glass and gain a purer form. 2015

BHĀRAVI

281

Though she drank much wine, she did not get drunk
out of concern her lover may turn to another woman.

Inebriation requires the mind to be relaxed. 2010

282

On the pretext of drinking wine,
the young couple, their mouths together, are pouring out, in fact, the juice of love into one another's heart. 2016

JAYAMĀDHAVA

283

How can a half-drunk glass of wine glitter so? Well, that young woman kissed it with her pretty red lips and filled it with their glow. 2017

JAYAMĀDHAVA

284

'In this pleasure bower there is a jasmine vine whose lovely flowers none have plucked so far':
saying this, and softly taking the innocent maid by hand, a rogue led her to that lonely spot. 1866

JAYAMĀDHAVA

285

The bees forsake the vine whose blooms have already been gathered, and go to girls who wear them in garlands:
the wicked think only of themselves. 1863

286

The girl beheld a drop of water roll upon a lotus leaf
and, as if it were a pearl, stretched out her hand to get it. 1875

VALLABHADEVA

287

Wet skirts now cling to women's hips, the girdle strings so soaked in water that their bells have fallen silent, like stars turned pale in the moonlight. 1873

18. Love in Union

288

Should I merge within your limbs, or in myself absorb you?
After long I have you back and don't know what to do. 2027

289

Tell me truly, O my love,
what is it you do to me:
to hear you is a real pleasure, to see you is pure ecstasy. 2038

290

The bees are after you, my lady,
they think your eyes are lilies blue,
your lips the crimson phoenix flower, hands lotuses, cheeks blossoms true, your dark tresses they think to be their own kin and very dear:
it's hard to fend off their embraces, what all will you guard out here? 2037

291

In two lovers' game of dice
the wager was a kiss,

who the stake has won or lost—only Manmatha knows this. 2048

JAYAVARDHANA

292

‘Wait a bit! Let go my skirt!
Others will wake! O you are shameless!
At least put out the light, I beg you!’
These words of my beloved enthrall me more than even the act of love. 2053

RĀJAPUTRA PARPAṬI

293

She hurries to leave our room with friends, lowers her eyes when I look at her,
will not reply when spoken to,
turns her back to me in bed,
and trembles when embraced:
the newly wed bride is dear to me by this very contrariety. 2072

ŚRĪ HARSHADEVA

294

Though they hide the heart’s desire to begin making love,
the couple understand each other just by fleeting glances. 2044

KAYYATA

295

Newly married brides are full of longing when they are far, but then feel shy near their husbands, and afraid when trembling on the bed they lie. 2047

RUDRAṬA

296

It stole the joy from conversation, and pre-empted intercourse—when the lover's eyes were overcome by sleep, suddenly and perforce. 2050

297

When neglect is itself devotion, and not looking an ardent gaze, silence, too, a glad communion, then love, deep hidden, shows its face. 2051

298

Her husband has just returned from a difficult crossing of the desert.
The woman gazes at his face,
her eyes moist with relief,
and softly brushes, with her own sash, his camel, as she gives it fodder. 2075

299

She was offended, lay in bed with limbs inert, her back to him;
he, from behind, with gentle hand, caressed her softly round the navel;
she broke into a sweat of passion, her girdle slipped, but angry still,

she heaved a cunning put-on sigh and loosened the knot of her skirt. 2085

300

‘Do you think she does not know who has come and closed her eyes?
Why stand behind her? It is pointless, your limbs are bristling, and she knows.
Leave her, you fool, don’t you see the teardrops trickling down her face?’
Her friend spoke thus, and hastily the youth embraced the girl. 2068

301

Parted for ages, weak with longing, to meet again was so delightful that all the world seemed born anew.
The day was long, somehow it passed, and when night came, the couple spent more time in talking, than in making love. 2063

302

She clings? She melts?
She sleeps? She’s dead?
A hundred doubts assail me with my darling in my arms. 2088

303

Blessed be the mumblings of ‘yes’ and ‘no’ within her mouth as the lover grasps her hair, lifts up the face and forcibly kisses the haughty girl. 2090

VIJĀKĀ

304

The faltering voice, the sibilant sound,
the trembling hands, the half-closed eyes,
of women, in love-making's course, turn into Madana's weaponry. 2092

BHĀRAVĪ

305

Capriciousness and lack of shame, obstinacy and impudence,
the unpitying and passionate heart,
of calm and steadfastness no sense:
all these, not faults, but virtues prove in the act of making love. 2095

BHAṬṬA PARIBHŪTA

306

'Master! Lord! My darling! Hold me!
Hold me close! O you are wicked!
Cruel! Thinking of your own pleasure!
You hurt me! Stop! Enough! Enough!' Such words of women in making love are signs of their affection. 2096

BHAṬṬA KUMĀRA

307

After love, he made pretence of sleeping, when she kissed him but realized he was awake

as all his body bristled.
'You must be punished for this deceit!' Saying this, she bit his lip and got what she was after. 2102

308

At love's end, that charming girl gropes for her garment everywhere, at the flaming lamp a flower flings, and confused, with a little laugh, tries to close her husband's eyes, then at last, to his arms returns. 2105

309

Lying in the same bed,
their faces turned away;
not replying, ill at ease, wishing at heart to make up,
but conscious of their dignity.
At long last a sidelong glance,
a meeting of the eyes,
and the ice is broken:
the couple laugh, and swiftly passion reignites. 2112

310

Now the girdle tinkles,
the anklet bells are stilled;
this must be a lucky lover whose darling acts the man. 2122

311

May they fall upon your breast, the beads of perspiration, trickling from that lusty lass's face in heat of love, with roles reversed. 2119

312

He grasps her hair, his eyes riveted on the spot between her thighs, and she, the minx, well skilled in love, kisses her lover on the mouth. 2125

JAYAMĀDHAVA

313

I said, 'My dear, I'll be your girl, you be the man.' The doe-eyed maid shook her head, 'No! Never! No!' Then took a bracelet off her wrist, and fastening it on mine, she gave assent without a word. 2127

314

Here sprinkled with betel juice, there besmeared with aloe paste,
here a spread of scented powder,
there red lacquer from the feet, strewn with flowers spilt and scattered by the dishevelment of hair, the bedspread all the scenes recounts of a woman making love. 2123

315

Sugar candy, betel leaf, milk and butter, children's sound,
a maiden's glance, a poet's fancy:

these O Shakra, king of heaven, in your domain will not be found. 2138

316

Friend, you're very fortunate to be able to narrate
the sweet exchanges full of joy in meetings with your lover boy.
For, when his hand my darling placed on the skirt knot at my waist, I swear I cannot then recall any, anything at all. 2142

317

Lips with colour kissed away, eyes bereft of kohl,
tresses straggling on the face:
but at dawn, contented, their glory is more than of the night before, when merely ornamented. 2139

BHARTRISVĀMIN

318

When to the bed my lover came my skirt knot opened by itself—
I held the cord, but the dress slipped off with just a bit left on my hips.
That is all I know, dear friend, for when he took me in his arms,
who was he and I myself,
or how we two made love together,
I don't at all remember. 2147

AMARUKA

319

As the moon was kissing dawn
he saw her lord, the sun, appear, quickly then he hid himself, turning pale with fear. 2155

MUKTIKOSHTHAKA

320

At daybreaking, as I watched,
the dark veil of the lady, night, was by the sun's ray-hands removed,
and the moon despoiled of light. 2154

PUNṆYA

321

Ignoring his entreaty,
she turned her back,
pretended to sleep.
In time, she hears
the cock's loud crowing and turning over,
her eyes full of slumber
and still half-closed, the woman embraces
the lord of her life. 2175

MĀGHA

322

The horses wake and, softly neighing, search for grass on every side, the cock too waves its copper plume and sounds a note, both high and sweet, which lovers hear most angrily. 2168

323

Set to leave the trysting chamber now that night was almost over, she kissed and embraced him but was not contented;
with one foot on the floor, the other still in bed, that slender maid put her arms around her lover and gave him a long, long kiss. 2191

324

It inspires the poet's muse, makes palace pigeons chirp, and enrages husbands
of all beautiful women:
it is the trumpet's call at daybreak, and the clanging chains of elephants as they arise from dusty beds, the noise filling the sky. 2223

RĀJAŚEKHARA

325

When the pet parrot of the house, which heard at night the couple's love-talk, began repeating it in front of the elders in the morning, the bride, embarrassed and aghast, took a ruby from her eardrop and, pretending to the bird, that it was a pomegranate seed, stuffed the gem inside its beak to stop it prattling any more. 2214

19. Miscellaneous Verses: 1

326

‘Doctor, what would you advise as medicine for one stricken by that slender maiden’s flashing eyes?’
‘The best, an embrace I regard: grab her hair and kiss her hard.’ 2225

327

The arched eyebrow, the flitting glance, cunning, sidelong and delightful,
the tender mien, the bashful laugh,
the languid grace of pause and motion:
these are the ornaments of women,
and their weapons too. 2227

TWO KAVIPUTRAS

328

I am alone, a weak young girl, in this house. The master has gone away to foreign lands.
Foolish traveller, whom will you ask if you can stay here? My infirm old mother-in-law is deaf and blind. 2234

RUDRATĀ

329

The virgin is merely curious,
the widow just seeks friction,
the harlot wants a bit of money, one's spouse has no other option.
The reasons, for which women want men, are a vast variety;
it needs good karma to get another's bride, purely out of amity. 2238

330

I speak the truth, there is no bias.
This is a fact. In all the world, than girls there is naught more enchanting, nor more unique a source of pain. 2231

331

The bashful glances at each other,
the words sent through a message bearer to meet tomorrow or today, loving, joyous, all the way,
and when the meeting does take place,
the ardent kisses and embrace:
this is Kama's harvest true—
the rest even the animals do. 2237

332

Fresh made ghee, and milk with ice, turmeric, a new shawl's drape,
red saffron, aruka fruit and turasi, wood apples, honey and the grape, a Kira lass with limbs as tender as lotus buds: I have to say a Kashmiri who knows not these,

I think had better silent stay. 2243

333

A mango grove, a fragrant breeze,
the ground a dark-green lawn of grass, a lute's soft sound, a cup of wine stirred with jasmine buds, a tranquil moonlit night, and sidelong glances from a girl with lovely lotus eyes—what else is worthwhile in a world as fleeting as the lightning's flash? 2251

MANGALAVATSA

334

Till then only does man stay on the course of virtue's way, keep his urges in control,
of shame and decorum know the role:
till, from brows drawn to the ear,
the arrow of some wanton glance released, dark-winged, his heart will tear, and rob him of his resistance. 2246

DHARMAKĪRTI

335

Where is the cloud, and where the peacock with its fan of brilliant feathers?
Where the pure-rayed moon, and where the waves upon the ocean's waters?
Behold the rising sun, and see the lotus ringed with bees so gay:

one who loves another, pleases the heart from even far away. 2240

20. The Heroic Mode

336

Into battle as I go,
this I swear and firmly vow:
the enemy force will never see the hind side of my cavalry.
I cannot promise any more:
fate is fickle, and in war both defeat and victory must depend on destiny. 2275

CHANDAKA

337

Many study law books,
even the one-legged can;
but one who will bear
the sharp-edged stroke of the enemy's sword—
such a man is rare. 2255

RĀJAPUTRA ARGATA

338

Earth, be still!
O serpent, hold her!
Tortoise king, support them both!

And to steady all the three,
you cosmic elephants, be prepared:
the prince now draws great Shiva's bow. 2282

FROM BĀLARĀMĀYAṆA

339

When trampled on, it rises up and engulfs the trampler's head—even that dust is better than the much humiliated man who just will not react. 2264

MĀGHA

340

So long his honour is intact, till then truly he's a man,
good fortune will wait upon him and glory with him stay. 2266

BHĀRAVI

341

Mount Meru's peak is not too high,
nor the nether world too low, or even the sea uncrossable—but only for determined men. 2260

21. Humour and Satire

342

To raise the fallen,
and make the risen fall:
your powers strange, vagina,
seem supernatural. 2293

VYĀGHRAGAṆA

343

Proudly struts the yokel, sash around the waist,
flashing his underskirt, jabbering for a penny's sake. 2295

344

Widows are caught up with gigolos, and housewives with their husbands, whores want only wealthy men, students make do with the hand. 2296

345

It's women's eyes
which do the flirting;
but it all ends up

at an innocent spot between the legs. 2297

346

Pliant to start with,
then turning stiff,
ruthless in business,
and when it is done
all soft again:
merchants, in life,
are just like the penis. 2298

347

Many thorns the rose surround, lilies bloom in muddy ground, each charmer has a go-between:
fault-free gems are seldom seen. 2299

348

There is no fear
your palate will split
or your tongue be pulled out;
so, freely speak:
a man loquacious
is deemed perspicacious. 2300

349

Faulty words are deer, afraid of the lion which is grammar;
where could they hide, if not within the depths of all those mouths cavernous of gurus, clowns, astrologers, physicians and vedic priests? 2301

350

The astrologer may calculate the moon's union with a star but, alas, is unaware who his good wife's lovers are. 2302

351

It's sinful to go for another's wife, one's own does not exist;
so, much praised by men well raised is the beauty held in one's fist. 2303

352

The fair and fetching plump expanse of that whore's depilated pubes is like the golden slope of Meru grazed clean by stallions of the sun. 2304

353

'This is my rice,
and this my wheat,
these my lovely beans.'
While man thus bleats,
'mine, mine, mine, mine,'
in voice caprine,
he's taken away by death. 2306

354

Who indeed can call him clever?
The Creator was a fool—
he made no oil in pumpkins nor on elephants wool. 2307

355

Of planets he's the tenth, located in the daughter's sign for good, always difficult and demanding,
a drain upon your livelihood:
in the horoscopes they draw he is the proverbial son-in-law. 2308

356

Death laughs at him
who guards his health,
the world at him
who hoards his wealth,
and she laughs too—
the adultrous wife,
at her husband, guarding the son like his life. 2309

357

This serpent's mouth
is down below,
with a single tooth
and a lethal flow
which has no cure.
It's called vagina
and it has bitten
all men for sure. 2310

358

Fool, when getting food for free, for life do not so cautious be:
free food is difficult to obtain, life, with rebirth, will come again. 2311

359

For comfort in their afterlife parents pray for children, who will send them clotted cream in heaven, with poached and roasted pheasant too. 2313

360

A mouth which is not occupied with helpful words for some poor soul, with savouring betel or kissing lips, is no better than the nether hole. 2316

361

Drink from wayside water tanks, eat at the public table,
sleep inside a place of worship, fuck wherever you are able. 2317

362

It was summer,
the priest was asleep
beneath a tree,
a dog appeared
and pissed on his hand, he muttered the words
for taking a fee. 2318

363

Salutations, my lord doctor, you dispatch men without exception;
giving you this onerous duty,
Death enjoys a fine vacation. 2319

MAYA

364

The physician has no mastery over how long life will be.
All his physic
just therein lies:
he robs the sick,
from the dead he flies. 2320

MAYA

365

‘Doctor, I am weak with fever, say what is the remedy.’
‘Drink a cup of some strong liquor and bring another one for me.’ 2321

MAYA

366

Sages, themselves prone to anger, teach others not to angry be,
like paupers who, to make a living, preach the merits of alchemy. 2323

HARSHA

367

If the clerk could never eat his mother’s flesh while in her womb, the only reason for this feat was: at the time he had no teeth. 2326

368

With quill tucked behind his ear,
the clerk you must not trust;
better do so with black serpents or wild tigers, if you must. 2327

369

The deer of bad language, killed by lions of grammar, were eaten by actors and doctors, and pale men from another land. 2333

370

With some skill at this or that, man attains the princely caste where in cursing lies his merit, his manliness in fashions fast. 2335

PRAKĀŚAVARSHA

371

Friend, listen to this wondrous deed
a rustic lover did today:
I closed my eyes in carnal pleasure,
he feared I was dead, and ran away. 2338

DĀMODARAGUPTA

372

For treating bile the kiss is best, for wind the pressure of her chest,
for phlegm it's ceaseless intercourse:
thus, for calming all three humours, always to a girl recourse. 2340

373

373

A bed well made, a charming house, a faithful and congenial spouse:
these a match can never prove for a moment brief of secret love. 2342

DĀMODARAGUPTA

374

That strumpet is a box of bliss, her cheek is pale with passion, her pubic zone depilated is,
may all rascals get their ration. 2345

RANḌĀNANDA

375

For one who comes though not invited, gets angry looks
but seats himself,
death is better than any dinner. 2348

376

The letter t is always short in rustic, servant, unchaste, cheat; why it's doubled in priestly titles—for this a harlot you must meet. 2352

377

Bribes, rewards and rental payments,
one should accept immediately;
the same is true of a share in wealth, of stolen goods and poetry.

These six, not taken there and then,
may not be offered ever again. 2349

378

The priest keeps cows, but sells the milk, and uses water for oblations
in the sacrificial fire.
He's also reputed to follow
the scriptures in sexual conduct, but sleeps with menstruating whores, and that in daylight too. 2353 379

Seeing a god made out of gold the stones rejoice at their salvation from being beaten, burnt and chiselled, and bless the smith for his creation. 2354

SUVARṆAKĀRA IŚVARAVARMĀ

380

Fish prepared with oil and salt, ginger, pepper, pomegranate peel,
with walnuts garnished, touched with saffron, and served on a bed of cool, white rice:
the doer of this act of merit is bound to go to paradise. 2357

381

The bed is small, its strings not tight,
the whoremaster talks incessantly, worse luck, it's chill this winter night,
O what a load of misery! 2356

382

If I cut them off, what is the point of living like an ox;
or like a bull by keeping them;
if I sit and stretch my legs, people always laugh at me:
the size of my balls is a nuisance. 2355

RATNABHŪTI

383

He measures out rice
like Indra his diamonds, and displays greens
like a barb from a bone, but the sauce so spiced that it burns the throat, he serves most freely,
just like water. 2358

384

Even though one reaches eminence by learning well the Vedas four,
the systems six, the fourteen skills, and all the classic arts there are:
still one fails, if unaware of the wheeling dealing here. 2359

385

Her waist is no more than a fist, her belly is two arm's length round, like swinging bells her two breasts list towards the pelvis further down.
Her laughter's sound is like a horn, her face can well inspire fear, even so this courtesan

both repels and draws me near. 2360

386

Clad in a pair of white garments, the girdle creased with three days' use, his hair brushed upwards, legs and thighs with razor scraped, there stands a man looking out, by the temple bull, for a quiet place to get some girl. 2361

387

Both good times and bad are certain in this world for every creature.
An old man will be jilted by young women, it's a part of nature.
In every clan there is a man who gains great prosperity;
and if maids behave like menfolk can,
know that's the end of the family. 2362

388

He takes no meat or alcohol,
but drinks good people's blood;
though observing religious fasts,
he steals the temple food,
and that kept for cows and brahmins while listening to the liturgy;
proud partner of these evil times, whose friend can an official be? 2363

389

He asks you questions, tells strange tales, scratches, feels inside his clothes, looks at the sun and counts the days, laughs excessively, swats mosquitoes, goes out, quarrels with his workers, drops a pitcher, puts out fire:
these are the goldsmith's dozen tricks to distract you as he steals your gold. 2364–65

390

Do it, lover, while you may,
your youth is passing every day.
After death, who'll offer you with funeral rites a sweet cunt too? 2366

391

May this whore give joy to you, her gaze is candid, embrace soft,
and laughter graceful—never loud.
No more for her pursuit of pleasure, she visits shrines and holy men;
but her breasts are large and firm, of wits and panders she's still queen, and all her lovers are good men. 2367

392

Harlots, too, look for salvation and bliss with all intensity, but, perhaps, in their devotions just one blemish there could be:
and it is that, with lips perfumed with scented wine and betel sections, they kiss the mouths of holy priests much defiled by benedictions. 2368

393

I have, my beauty, just one dollar,
it's in my belt for security;
I earned it with a lot of labour, take half of it—be kind to me. 2370

394

With his cash, the harlot can in any old and leprous man, see a second god of love;
but moneyless, no better than any old and leprous man is a second god of love. 2369

KSHEMENDRA

395

In this chilly winter time, may your cooking pots be full with paste of lotus stem and root, bright and smooth as elephant tusk, with fritters rich in pepper, and pieces of the shakuni fowl. 2371

396

She bears fresh nail marks on the thigh but fears having them on other limbs; her eyes are dull with sleep and red with kisses, yet a flicker will summon another paramour;
a wish-fulfilling vine for gallants, this tart cannot be had without many holy deeds of merit. 2373

The limbs are weak, it is futile to stretch them out for an embrace; the penis droops, to make it rise—the mere effort is too hard to face for the worn-out, flaccid flesh;
 the girl's distressed, it is most awkward—in making love, an old man's toil:
 in thinking of it, what will be better—to laugh a bit or weep a while? 2374

BHAṬṬA VRIDDHI

398

You are alert, can mind your limbs, shake the head and move the feet, answer questions, need less help,
 and rice no more refuse to eat.
 The fever's gone, and also thirst, of chronic illness you are free and looking, once again, alive, it is a joy today to see. 2375

399

Grasping, like with meat a vulture, guarding, like its hive the bee, fierce like a sharp-clawed tigress, venomous like a serpent, she
 in turns and twists is like a fish, in stealing things just like a mouse;
 the harlot has so many aspects for cheating clients in her house. 2377

400

Readings loud from holy books, endless tales of piety,
talking much with womenfolk, endearments for their progeny, praise fictitious for their cooking, their good fortune and competence, blessings for their male relations,
some talk of one's experience,
and then a greeting once again:
in monks these are the merits main. 2378

401

Love purchased is like a medicine, a labour, when to power due,
with one's spouse it's just mechanics:
it's something else which is love true. 2381

402

'Why is this food so salty dear?'
'Why don't you cook it on your own?'
'Hell! Don't you answer back like this!'
'To hell yourself! Your father too!'
'Damn you for your angry words!'
'You liar! Who gets angry more?'
With the couple always bickering, can their torment ever end and there be some joy? 2379

403

If, even though an utter fool, you wish knowledgeable to appear before a group of dull-wits, then speak of eminent persons there, take names of well-known authors, display some books of quality,

some learned scholars vilify, wave hands and laugh uproariously. 2383

404

For scholarship a reputation
if you wish to gain perforce, even though to sacred learning
you have never had recourse:
then as your own, claim others' works, stand proud as you recite some verse with half-closed eyes, and be dramatic while running down in language terse Vyasa and the other lions of literature in days gone by;
as for learned men at present, challenge them, their skills decry. 2385

405

Friend, my husband has all the merits which heroes, chiefs and princes do, my life would have been worthwhile if he were my lover too. 2387

406

My husband has these merits which all young maids adore:
he sings and kisses like a bird, in making love he's more passionate than a rutting elephant.
A perfect moon? I have no word, he's faultless but for one thing:
he is my wedded lord! 2386

407

Do not groan! O spinning wheel!
She sends us all in a spin with a simple sidelong glance.
You, at least, are turned by hand. 2388

408

I hold the sacred thread, all pure, and this solemn oath do swear:
than girls there's naught delightful more nor greater trouble here. 2390

409

It pleases even when it's flowing,
even when the mind it shames;
this natural cleft delights the eye,
and shaven, shines in lovers' games;
it is the vagina, wondrous fair, may all of you its blessings share. 2391

410

The sacred ground is marked for worship with lotus flowers, but to hide a cat's shit lying there, they use the leaves kept for the ceremony.
It's like a fool, his sin to cleanse, of sleeping with another's wife, should call her 'mother' and thereby aggravate it even more. 2392

411

For food forbidden, sick men hanker, for money those in penury,

for hurting others, wicked people, women for the joys of adultery. 2393

412

He curses not the moon, nor waits for sweet words from a messenger;
burning sighs don't singe his heart,
his body does not waste away;
he sleeps embracing his own spouse,
one faithful and amenable.
Is it love? It's not, alas, just the tiresome married state. 2398

413

Its friction makes the girls cry out, young women emit squeals of joy;
the more mature, this rod ambrosial, makes their deepest griefs forget;
it churns the oceanic depths of old vaginas, like Mandara;
long live this tusk of Indra's elephant, this mighty club, this prick of yours. 2401

414

'Monk, your cloak is rather loose.'
'It is a net for catching fish.'
'You eat fish?' 'With wine betimes.'
'You drink?' 'When with a courtesan.'
'You go to them?' 'I kick my enemies.'
'You have foes?' 'I burgle their homes.'
'You also steal?' 'Because I gamble.'
'You rogue!' 'I am a slave-girl's son.' 2402

415

‘Someone else enjoys the pleasure in being used, the pain our lot,’ the crone’s breasts seem to say while reaching down towards the other spot. 2406

22. Pen Pictures

416

Eager for home, the traveller goes singing, laughing, dancing, thinking of the girl in his heart, not the ups and downs of the road. 2408

417

First they grunt like rumbling clouds and slowly arch their bodies, then, scraping with their hooves the earth, pointing their horns straight ahead, slowly, slowly, close they come and, feet firm planted, strike furiously, their curving tails uplifted:
these two big bulls afighting. 2424

418

Night is over, and the cat gets up from beneath the oven, yawns and twitches all its limbs to shake the cinders out. 2407

419

The child covers its mouth and nose with the hand, all fingers stretched out, and loudly squeals:

my heart it steals. 2411

VALLABHADEVA

420

He takes a few uncertain steps holding to the nurse's hand, then, with the confidence of practice, he comes crawling on all fours, showing tiny buds of teeth.
Words cannot describe, O friend, the pleasure given by one's child. 2414

BHAṬṬA JANĀRDANA

421

'Please, good mother, pity me,
a stranger who is tired out.
I'll pass the night in just a corner of the porch outside your door sleeping very quietly.'
Pleading thus, but quick rebuffed by the housewife's sharp abuse, the traveller picks up his possession, a bundle no more than a fistful of straw, and moves on again. 2416

RAVIDATTA

422

Hearing his mother say
'Your father's come!'
all at once the little boy leaves his game with other children and, dust covered, arms spread out, comes shouting from afar and smiling, to one who cannot but be blessed by this love supreme. 2415

423

The donkey sniffs the odour, and mouth agape, displaying teeth, he runs braying loud behind the fleeing she-ass, her kicks redoubling his urge to copulate.
With organ taut he mounts her fast but is bewildered and comes down, his natural wish denied. 2422

ŚRI MAYŪRA

424

From the clouds the water streaming at midnight in the palm forest, the elephants stand with half-shut eyes, their palm-leaf ears now motionless,
and listen to the falling rain, their trunks reclining on their tusks. 2413

23. Verses of Flattery

425

‘Why serve Krishna
who churned and hurt me, and sleeps all day
upon my waves?
Better wait on someone who understands, is kindly and always wide awake.’ Thinking thus, and cognizant of your fame, O king,
the sea of milk has here arrived in the guise of snow to serve you. 2632

✽

When the clouds were raining snow, this verse, commixed with flattery, addressed to Śrī Jainollābhadīn, was made by Śrī Baka, that is me. 2633

426

Averse to engagement
even when summoned, not showing openly
the play of its parts,
and unable to act
like a man upon you,

your enemy's army
is like a new bride. 2489

VIKAṬANIṬAMBĀ

427

It is stainless and strong,
pure, well tempered,
of noble lineage
and always sheathed.
Your sword wins hearts,
for it is like you. 2471

428

In the rich, generosity;
in the great, humility;
in well-born women, modesty;
on a person's tongue, poetry;
in elephants, ichor; in woods, a koel;
on buds, a bee; in bed a girl;
a nail mark on the beloved's cheek:
O king, all these are ornaments, as you are of the world. 2622

429

Why ever talk of happenings
in other people's homes, but with my southern, talkative, nature I cannot be silent.
In every house, in markets,
in squares and drinking parties, your darling madly circulates, she is, sir, your fame. 2544

MĀTANGA DIVĀKARA

430

O king, your glory is adorned by your mind, your mind by learning, your learning by good policies, your policies by valiant prowess, your valour by your fame,
your fame by deeds, your deeds by brilliance traditional in your family which your birth itself adorns. 2577

431

Listen, king, in heaven, earth, or in the nether world of serpents, there never was or is or will be any chief who can compare in statecraft, glory, modesty, in foes' destruction, love of art, in piety and in fame with you. 2514

432

'Whose verse is this?' 'It's only mine.'
'Good, read it out again, sir poet.
But, friend, it has been used before!
Others have expressed this thought.'
The pain which such words cause to poets, like axe strokes on their vine of hope,
O king, may your enemies suffer too. 2568

24. Verses of Counsel

433

Some are deer in tigers' garb,
some are tigers dressed as deer;
to place your trust in such reversals is to invite trouble here. 2738

434

If you are unable to follow the path of good men all the way, pursue it even a little bit,
on that road one can't be lost. 2641

435

The greatest dharma is to do good to others, well and true; no greater wealth can ever be than in one's work dexterity;
no pleasure is delightful more than giving in a worthy cause; and true salvation is to be from every earthly craving free. 2642

436

The goddess of prosperity will never go near one who is too noble-minded, too generous, bold and pious,

and proud of his own intellect:
she's scared of such a person. 2646

437

The lazy will not wealth attain,
nor the timid, or the proud,
or those who fear the people's clamour, and folk who just wait all the time. 2647

438

For one whose self is ill-secured even friends are enemies:
for weak digestions, even wholesome food can sickness cause or death. 2653

439

'What will not, will never be,
what will, must come to pass for sure.'
For every care this remedy, why not take and fret no more. 2662

440

Without harming others, yielding to the wicked,
and giving up the right path, what little one gets—it is enough. 2660

441

In pain, look at a greater pain, in pleasure, on some greater pleasure, to grief and joy do not surrender—both are your foes in equal measure. 2668 442

Look at the outcome
of constant practice:
even fools become knowledgable, gradually, mountains turn to powder, termites consume a tree. 2679

443

Of family, friends and kinsmen, of one's own mind and grit, man discovers the reality on the touchstone of calamity. 2688

444

An ant on the move can go a hundred miles or more,
but an eagle, motionless, will not progress
a single step for sure. 2686

445

The soft approach
is never respected,
the hard leads always
to enmity;
abjure both and follow
a middle policy. 2692

446

In all three worlds
there is no charm
to compare with this for winning others:
friendliness and charity, sweetness of speech, and for each creature, sympathy. 2694

447

From foes and fear and grief protecting, your pleasures and your trust respecting,
who coined this word, this apophthegm called 'friend' which is, in fact a gem. 2700

448

Thinking that all comes from fate, effort you should not disdain, without pressing seeds of sesame,
who can oil from them obtain? 2723

449

One who sits back, full of trust, after making peace with enemies, is like the man sleeping on the branch of a tree who will wake up on falling down. 2756

450

A group with many leaders,
each one proud and clever,
and all wishing to be important, is bound to be ruined. 2724

451

By a foe, with respect treated,
you may another eliminate,
as you would a thorn stuck in the foot
with one held in the hand. 2763

452

To those who live on Malaya's slope, sandal is but firewood;
gems no more than rocks and stones for denizens of the ocean's shore;
the residents of Kashmir, too,
have no respect for saffron:
distance lends great value, and proximity breeds disdain. 2942

453

Replanting uprooted trees, culling those in flower,
helping small ones grow,
and pruning those too tall or dense, separating the intertwined, placing thorny shrubs aside,
and nurturing those he plants:
a clever king, acting the gardener, rules his realm for long. 2947

454

Better than a foolish brood is a single child with merit:
darkness does one moon preclude,
a thousand stars can't do it. 2730

455

By mere touch can elephants kill, by sniffs alone the serpents will,
sovereigns with a smile do slay, and villains as they homage pay. 2752

456

Danger one should always dread, as long as it is far away.
But once it is upon your head—strike a blow as heroes may. 2755

457

The wise will not use harsh methods, where softer ones can work:
if bile is calmed
with sugar, why
use the bitter gourd? 2874

ARGAṬA

458

With money one has many a friend, and kinsmen too, one also can on being acclaimed a sage depend, one is then counted as a man. 2816

459

To consort with another's wife, to hanker for another's wealth,
to insult teachers and elders, neither gives happiness here nor in afterlife. 2900

RĀHULAKA

460

One whose repute
is not acclaimed
for death in war or victory, for learning or for charity or for great wealth:
his existence
has little difference
from that of an insect. 2901

VARĀHAMIHIRA

461

One who even guards a cent from ever being wrongly spent, as if a hoard of gold it were;
but will spending millions dare when situations so demand, and do it with an open hand—
the goddess of prosperity will never leave one such as he. 2911

ŚRI HARSHA

25. On Dharma

462

This is the essence of dharma, listen to it attentively:
do not do to others
what you would not like done to you. 2950

463

Kinsmen turn away and go leaving the dead person's body on the ground like a log of wood:
dharma alone does follow it. 2954

464

Earn that treasure, in having which there is no fear of thief or king, and which will always stay with you, even after death. 2957

465

Straightforwardness and kindness, self-restraint, control of the senses:
this is the common dharma of all four castes, Manu has said. 2959

466

Truth is not just a word for the real, nor falsehood for that which is unreal;
where lies the ultimate benefit of creatures—that is real truth. 2969

467

In moving or in standing still,
in sleeping and in dreaming too, whatever your actions be—
if not for the benefit of others, they are but animal activity. 2970

468

The difference between recipients unworthy or not of a gift is as with cows and snakes:
with one grass turns into milk, with the other milk into poison. 2975

469

Earned lawfully and gifted, even a penny bears mighty fruit, but not the thousands given of wealth obtained illegally. 2976 470

They too must experience pain when pricked even by a thorn, yet such people savour flesh of animals butchered with knives. 2982

471

For those who drink wine, kill a priest, steal, or break a solemn vow, atonement is possible, O king, but none for one ungrateful. 2988

472

Non-violence, truth, compassion for all creatures, self-restraint, and charity within one's means:
this is the householder's dharma. 3010

473

In all man's actions
what needs discernment
is purity of intent:
the mistress is kissed with one,
the daughter with another. 2966

474

Rituals holy, sacred study, doing penance, charity,
truth, forgiveness, solicitude, and not coveting: virtue's road with these eight, the scriptures say, is paved to form the righteous way.
But, of these the first four go to serve often an outward show.
The latter four can only be in someone with true piety. 2997–98

475

In action, mind and speech, to be devoid of malice
for all beings, and to show them kindness and charity:

this, the wise have said,
is true morality. 3047

476

Guard character with care, wealth will come and go,
man is not lost by loss of money, but without character he is dead. 3048

477

Knowledge is wealth in foreign lands, common sense in times of trouble, virtue is wealth in afterlife, and good character everywhere. 3053

KSHEMENDRA

478

Just as when a garment's soiled,
it's so no matter where you sit, character too, once it is spoiled has nothing left for guarding it. 3049

26. The Iron Age of Kali

479

As the Age of Kali ends
all will be demons, who

in the shape of human beings, eat other men, not in the flesh,
but by devouring their money.

3056

VYĀSA

480

This wicked Iron Age has taken mankind into such condition that wanting to cause injury to the master and the friend is a merit thought to be.

3058

481

By every dread disease afflicted, to plunder by cut-throats subjected,
by kings oppressed, to famines bound,
the people now go round and round.

3064

482

The time is past when one's worth grew with good and honest work;

now do not take the useless trouble of acquiring merit;

instead, to get on with your life, resort to shameless impudence.

3065

483

‘What hope from that villain?’

‘But he is good-hearted and I have done a lot for him.’

‘Forget it. Good is just a word in ancient books. Today people care only for money, even a little bit of it.’

3066

484

In this Age of Kali, when dharma has retired from this world;
truth and penance disappeared;
the earth is turning infertile

the earth is turning upside,
the people cheats, the brahmins fools,
the rulers thoughtless and oppressive;
and sons hate fathers, wives fight husbands;
blessed are they who are dead.

3076

485

Moonlit nights they spend at brothels, in ardent festivals of pleasure amidst women with wine-scented mouths.

In daytime, as all-knowing ascetics, since long engaged in sacred rituals, ordained and fully enlightened, these rascals cheat the world.

3077

486

‘Where to, brother?’ ‘To the city.’

‘For what?’ ‘In the hope of a job.’

‘With whom?’ ‘The king.’ ‘But how?’

‘On my merits.’ ‘And what are they?’

‘Those of all decent people.’

‘What use are they today!’ ‘What then?’

‘Take to the forest. Haven’t you heard?’

Greedy villains are favoured now, and jobs go to the scandalmongers.'

3072

27. The Power of Past Deeds

487

As among a thousand cows
the calf runs after its mother, so too deeds done previously always pursue the doer. 3081

488

Salute the gods? But even they cannot escape relentless fate.
Salute that fate? But even it bears fruit to deeds proportionate.
Then, if fruit depend on deeds, are gods and fate of any avail?
Salutations to deeds on which even fate cannot prevail. 3079

489

Such is the marvel in this world of deeds done in a previous birth:
the undisciplined live long lives,
the servile have of wealth no dearth. 3084

490

Why be depressed in adverse times and wonderstruck in prosperity?

It is by previous deeds decided, whatever has to be will be. 3087

491

The fruit which deeds of people bear are most uneven, it is seen:
some the palanquin do carry,
some ride upon the palanquin. 3092

492

Whatever man earns
with lifelong labour,
his heirs divide
when he is dead;
the evil he did
for greed of wealth alone remains that unfortunate's property. 3099

VYĀSA

493

Fruit come not from looks or family, morals, learning or pure speech.
It is merit amassed from deeds done by man in former lives that bears fruit for him in due time, like a tree. 3100

AŚVAGHOSHA

494

The man to whom the gods award

defeat, his mind
they overturn:
he sees things
upside down. 3095

28. Fate

495

O the supreme ability of fate which often marks its scheme of distribution:
where merit stays, there is no money, where money is, there stays no merit. 3108

ŚRI VYĀSA MUNI

496

As, in giving away a daughter, one ensures the quality of family, learning, prowess, age and good character of the groom, so does clever destiny
when it hands out poverty. 3109

497

Fate is the master
not just of men
but even of the gods.
Though Shiva's friend
is the god of wealth,
yet his garment
is animal skins. 3111

RAVIGUPTA

498

Something beyond one's wildest wish, beyond even the poet's fancy,
hard to attain even in a dream, yet fate bestows it in a trice. 3115

499

Base, impious, meritless, fickle minded, harsh of speech,
if such a one great wealth enjoys, is it his prowess, or his fate? 3116

VALLABHADEVA

500

When the sun eclipsed I see,
and elephants wild in fettered state,
and able men in poverty,
Then I realize the power of fate. 3125

501

Alas, the folly of fate!
In man it has created a mine of limitless merits, a jewel to adorn the earth, yet made his existence
so very transitory. 3126

PHALGUHASTINI

502

A bald man's head was getting scorched by the rays of the noonday sun.
Seeking shade, he stopped perchance beneath a bilva tree, wherefrom a great ripe fruit fell on his head and cracked it with a loud report.
Disasters often happen just where unlucky people chance to go. 3141

DIVIRADEVĀDITYA

503

Though tossed by angry winds of fate,
the sea, which is the noble heart,
will not transgress its proper limit, that is the way of its waves. 3107

GOVINDARĀJA

504

In placing wish-fulfilling trees on Mount Sumeru, whose celestial denizens have no wishes left; gems within the fathomless waters of the mighty ocean;
and affluence with wicked villains;
the Creator has, in truth, blacked out a bright lamp with a pot. 3135

PRAKĀŚAVARSHA

505

For serpents the Creator made a diet of air, obtained with ease without recourse to violence;

for beasts He laid young shoots and grass to eat, and ground to sleep upon;
but for men, with wits to cross the ocean of this worldly round, were made such means of livelihood—in securing which men's virtues are, one and all, destroyed. 3139

BHARTRIHARI

506

A snake, confined inside a basket, lay hungry, coiled, all hope exhausted, when, at night, a mouse crept in through a hole that it had bored and fell into the serpent's mouth.
Revived by its flesh, the snake escaped by that very mouse-made hole.
So, be at ease, it's fate alone which ensures the rise and fall of men. 3143

29. Times of Trouble

507

It is better to be born a tree growing in some barren patch, by fire of its bark denuded, stunted, eaten up by worms, than a suppliant to be. 3166

508

‘Sit down! Stand up! Come here! Away!
Speak! Be silent!’ Even so—with supplicants who to them go, gripped by hope, do rich men play. 3168

509

The ashen face, the voice choked up,
the trembling body, the perspiration:
these signs of one about to die are the very same as of one who has to make a supplication. 3172

510

Blessed are they who do not see the break-up of their family, their wives in love with other men,

their children caught in vice's den, and their country cease to be. 3173

511

Moonlight, lutes and sandalwood, beds and coaches, maidens nice, cannot please a famished man:
all must start with a plate of rice. 3174

512

Forbear you did, but not forgive, pleasures give up, but not in peace, suffered chill winds, unbearable heat,
but without penitential spirit;
with every breath you thought of money,
night and day, but not of Shiva:
all the ascetic's deeds you've done, but their fruit escape you. 3178

513

Living is like death
for one sick or exiled or dependent on others
for daily bed and board;
death for him is rest. 3184

514

We were cut down by sharp-edged swords of insult, scorn and humiliation; burnt and branded through and through by fierce flames of penury;
we even quaffed the venomous brew of favours done by kinsmen; yet we go on living. Is the god of death so fast asleep? 3179

515

The cold gives me goose pimples, like hair upon a bean pod.
The fire has gone out.
My lips are chapped with blowing,
and throat parched with sneezing.
I drown in a sea of worry.
Sleep left me like a lover scorned and fled far away.
And night, like well-invested wealth, goes on and on forever. 3181

MĀTRIGUPTA

516

When their money's gone, the base live as beggars, cheats and bandits; for the good, whom family honour keeps silent, there is no more life. 3182

KSHEMENDRA

517

For lack of money, every day worrying over rice and oil, greens, butter, salt and firewood, dulls the minds of even the wise. 3188

518

A golden beast is just impossible, yet Rama wanted such a deer;

often the mind turns contrary when disaster is drawing near. 3189

519

No rice inside the pot,
the family faint and famished;
no lamp to burn at night;
all facilities plunged in darkness;
no well-wishers at the door,
the festivities suspended;
alas this house has turned as painful as a prison. 3192

520

In my home the mouse has turned as minuscule as a mosquito, the cat has shrunk to mouse's size,
the dog is no more than a cat.
What to say of other people,
my wife is worn out, like a dog;
and, witness to the dying babies,
the oven hides in spider webs,
the cricket's hum its mournful cry. 3197

30. On Being a Servant

521

Hug a tiger with gaping jaws, kiss a serpent's hissing mouth,
for men to serve kings is no better:
it is like licking a razor's edge. 3225

522

The master laughs, and so does he;
the master weeps, he wails aloud;
the master runs, he girds his waist and sprints, sweating profusely;
the master censures some unblemished merit, he condemns it:
the servant, bought for a bit of money, dances to his master's tune. 3232

DHARMAKIRTI

523

Your Majesty's ears I filled with words devoid of meaning;
you too did the same with me,
the words even more inane.
Thus we both have passed our time deceiving one another.

My strength now fades, I am defeated, you win, you are the king. 3234

KIŚORAKA

524

It's always hard to find a master, forgiving and generous, who respects and values merit;
to find a loyal, honest, clever servant, sir, is difficult too. 3228

ŚRI HARSHADEVA AND HIS SERVANT

525

The servant is deprived of both his comfort and his dignity; of that for which he money seeks,
he poorer tends to be. 3211

526

He does not care
if you're stopped at the door; takes no notice
when you manage to meet him;
blinks like an elephant
at your presentation;
pretends to agree
and, after you leave,
runs you down.
At the smallest fault
a very death,
if you serve such a master,
what is wrong
with the ghouls of the desert? 3238

KSHEMENDRA

31. Cravings

527

Mounted on the chariot of desire, drawn by steeds which are the senses,
all the world goes round and round, urged on by craving, the charioteer. 3241

528

The face is covered with wrinkles,
the head has gone all grey,
the limbs are slack and feeble, only cravings youthful stay. 3242

529

The teeth have gone, the hair turned grey, speech chokes, one falters on the way, but craving, like a faithful wife, will not the ageing carcass leave—though it is set to part with life. 3254

530

One with a hundred wants a thousand,
the thousand-owner to make a million,
the millionaire to be a king,
the king to be an emperor, the emperor a god, and he

the lord of heaven, and even then to have some still higher position—there is no end to craving.
3255–56

531

Craving is a crafty whore who deludes everyone, robbing helpless fools
of the wealth of peace.
With Kama, sly and crooked rogue, and sparkling liquid sidelong glances of false love, she is ever adept in letting loose disaster. 3263

KSHEMENDRA

532

Love is like milk: it is boiled and cream is taken out, then it is churned to make butter and boiled again for ghee.
Loving seems to get attached to some kind of calamity. 3259

SUBHADRĀ

533

In many inaccessible lands
I knocked about, but gained nothing.
With anxious and tormented mind, setting aside the family's honour,
I spent my youth in fruitless work of servants, but to no avail.

O craving, what more do you wish, for that too I am ready. 3262

534

Craving, like a wanton woman, urges men to deeds forbidden but shame protects them from all sins like a second mother. 3245

535

O craving, you too crave to dwell in three particular places—in ailing people and the childless and in those bowed down with age. 3248

32. Transience

536

Wealth is pleasing, it is true, pretty girls delightful too, but life, like sidelong looks and sly of wanton women, just flits by. 3266

537

Death is certain for the born.
Birth is certain for the dead.
Therefore you should not lament for what is unavoidable. 3269

538

Those who wake to the sound of music and sweet song, and orphans, who on others for their food depend:
death takes equally the two. 3273

539

The rich man's wealth is that alone which he spends or gives away;
with the rest, when he is gone, and with his wives, will others play. 3283

540

Drifting in the sea's expanse, as two logs will meet by chance, and having met, will part perforce—such is creatures' intercourse. 3287

541

Death is certain for all creatures, it's certain life is transitory, who indeed can know today whose tomorrow's dawn will be? 3284

542

Mortals, why are you afraid of death? It will not spare the fearful. Only the unborn it does not take—so try never to be born again. 3295

543

In childhood bound in ignorance, drunk in youth with arrogance, in old age all the limbs afflicted—when can one be really well? 3302

ŚRĪ BAKA

544

Today it is childhood,
soon the glory of youth, then senescence. When the body itself keeps changing, how can one rely on things outside it. 3304

VĀLMIKI MUNI

545

Enchanting girls, congenial friends, good kinsmen, sweetly speaking servants,
all facilities, horses, elephants:
but once your eyes are closed, not a whit of this remains. 3318

ŚRI VIKRAMĀDITYA

546

‘I am here, this is my father,
this my mother, spouse and field,
my family, children, friends and foes, my wealth and house, my kin and siblings.’
On the bed which is this world, long asleep in ignorance, O mind deluded, you do see many dreams like this. 3321

KRISHNA MIŚRA

547

Property is like waves on water, youth lasts for two days, perhaps three,
life flits by like autumn clouds, what use is wealth? Do charity! 3316

548

Learned ones! Attend on God!
Cling not to painful scriptural study, for in this and the other worlds
Shiva is the only saviour.

When death's unceasing, dreadful danger comes on you by fate's decree, what will you gain from grammar, logic or even resort to poetry? 3322

ŚRIMAD RĀKJĀNAKA LAULAKA

549

In summer, ice and sandal paste, Chinese silk and moonlight;
in winter, deerswool shawls, and girls with saffron-tinted breasts embraced;
at night the sound of flutes, and songs of courtesans, and in the day fine assemblies: all of this done for an ungrateful body.
It is handsome, but will it last? 3323

KSHEMENDRA

550

This treasure serves the fourfold ends, it's hard to get and lasts a moment, now having it, if you do not think about your real benefit, who knows if you will ever have this human form again. 3313

BODHISATTVA

551

Not one moment of this life can be ever had again
even for a million sovereigns.

One who spends it to no purpose—salute that beast in human form. 3307

33. Derision of Lust

552

Even the mighty ocean's surge, propelled by fierce and violent winds, it is possible to restrain—but not the infatuated mind. 3333

ŚRĪ VYĀSA MUNI

553

If that which is within the body were to be outside it, people would be brandishing sticks to ward off dogs and crows. 3334

554

The hunter Kama has spread out the nets you here discern—it's only by their power that hell fires burn. 3337

555

It's like a slit upon the bloated belly of a frog turned upside down:
who but a maggot would be drawn to this slimy sore? 3341

556

This loathsome ulcer soiled with faeces and sweat, flowing urine and blood, has blinded all the world. 3342

557

Thinking about sense-objects brings you close to them;
from closeness springs desire which, thwarted, turns to anger.
From anger comes delusion, confusing the memory;
memory's loss destroys the mind, and with that man is lost. 3344–45

VYĀSA MUNI

558

In this life, so full of pain, there is no greater misery—
your longings cannot be fulfilled, nor are you from longings free. 3350

559

Desire is never stilled
by its satisfaction.
The sacred fire burns more brightly with every new oblation. 3352

560

Born, he takes away your wife, growing, takes away your wealth, in dying, takes away your life, there is no enemy like the son. 3367

ŚRĪ VYĀSA MUNI

561

Their words are full of honey, their hearts have only poison:
so, drink from the lips of women, but press and squeeze their breasts. 3380

KĀLIDĀSA AND MĀGHA

562

A handsome young woman, sitting or standing,
in sleep reclining,
the face turned away,
beautifully dressed
or not at all, when seen by weak-minded men will always attract them even through she is just in a picture. 3382

563

A scrawny cur,
one-eyed and lame,
with bitten ears
and tattered tail,
old and starving,
the foot stuck in a
a broken potsherd,
covered with sores
exuding pus

and slimy maggots:
yet this dog
pursues a bitch—Kama maddens
even him. 3390

564

Even though they may endure for long, sensual pleasures must inevitably fade away.
What difference does it make if people will not give them up willingly?
If they cease on their own, it grieves the heart immeasurably; but if they are renounced it gives one the infinite happiness of peace. 3386

JAYĀDITYA

34. Regrets

565

All my life has slipped away just in nursing aspirations, even now I have done nothing by good men worth remembering.

3393

566

To pleasures, now farewell, goodbye to talk of love,
alas, I am so very old,
those bright-eyed girls just look through me.

3395

567

My youth went by in a whirl of bargains of beauty in markets of love;
now wrinkles make a thousand patterns on the canvas of my body;
only the mind, discarding shame, keeps ever growing young.

3397

568

We did not enjoy pleasures,

we were consumed by them;
we did not observe austerity,
it branded us instead;
time did not pass,

it is we who are passing;
cravings do not wear away,
only we are worn out.

3396

569

I never acquired learning, well-honed and suitable for silencing disputants.

I did not spread my fame to the sky with the sword, piercing heads of war-elephants.

Nor did I in moonlight drink nectar from the tender lips of a pretty girl.

Alas, my youth passed uselessly, like a lamp burning

in an empty house.

3400

35. Aspiration

570

Lord, surrendering to you all my works of body, mind and speech, will I ever freedom gain from contradictions and become myself a part of you?

3402

571

Lord, when will I stand before you with the lamp of understanding which burns the wick of worldliness steeped in the oil of sin?

3403

572

A holy rosary in my hands,
at my throat the sacred beads, auspicious ash upon my body,
my hair a tawny matted coil,
a piece of bark around my shoulders:
thus may I live in tranquility at a hermitage, beneath a tree.

What more? And may the name of Shambhu in my ears forever be

in my ears forever be.

3411

573

Alone, at peace, of longings free, my hands the cup, my clothes the sky,
able to renounce the world, when will I, O Shambhu, be?

3404

574

The bliss unique of serving you, is a tree-filled garden's shade for a wanderer in the desert;
a well of ice-cold water for one fleeing from a forest fire;
nectar from a brew of poison,
and one's self rescued from madness: Shankara, when will I attain it and overcome this separation?

3414

VĀKPATI, SON OF ŚRI HARSHADEVA

575

By the side of the river which cleanses all sin, with breezes blowing and water at hand,

living in a hut

and wearing a rag,

I have no more relish
for this transient body.
3422

36. Miscellaneous Verses: 2

576

Maidens are no better than poison for an aged man, as food is poison for a person who is suffering indigestion, and the building of a house for one as penniless as a mouse:
it is the same for learning, got without having been truly taught. 3430

577

The man who eats
what he has earned
by his prowess and skill truly eats,
for even dogs
eat what they get by wagging their tails. 3432

578

Logic is inconclusive.
The scriptures differ.
There is no sage
whose word can be final.
The root of dharma

is hidden and secret.
The way by which the great have gone—
that is the path. 3437

DINNĀGA

579

Those driven by money
have no friend or kin;
by carnal lust,
no fear or shame;
by search of knowledge,
no sleep or comfort;
by pangs of hunger,
no grace or lustre. 3441

580

None torment the body
like pangs of hunger;
nothing sucks it dry
as does worry;
nothing ornaments it
more than learning;
and nothing nourishes it like a livelihood. 3442

581

O mind, you are so restless!
You plunge into the nether world and traverse the firmament, wandering in all directions.
Yet, though you course through other regions and lands,

you do not touch the self within,
where you would find repose. 3447

ARGAṬA

582

Some act humble out of fear, some out of greed
while seeking wealth,
others covet the fame of virtue.
No one in the world is good purely out of goodness. 3449

CHANDRAGOPIN

583

It's greed or conceit, fear or shame, which makes men modest, generally;
the modesty of heart which comes from detachment is a rarity. 3450

BHAṬṬA ŚRIDATTA

584

What is the use of empty talk?
There are always two recourses for men in this world:
handsome young women weighed down by their breasts and ardent with passion—their wildness, or the wilderness. 3453

BHAṬṬA UDBHAṬA

585

The moon turned pale in daylight;
a beautiful woman past her youth;
a lake bereft of lotus flowers;
the handsome visage of a fool;
a skinflint master; a good man out of luck;
and a villain in royal favour:
these seven rankle
like barbs in my heart. 3458

BHAṬṬA VRIDDHI

586

Who, on attaining affluence, does not succumb to arrogance?
When given up to pleasures, who can to troubles bid adieu?
Who has never jilted been
by women on this earthly scene?
Who escapes death's fearful sting?
And who is the favourite of the king?
Which beggar ever gets respect?
Which man is there who can expect,
when fallen in a villain's snare, to go home safe, without a care? 3470

FROM PANCHATANTRA

587

We are here content with rags,
and you with your great affluence.
The satisfaction is the same,
it has no special difference.
Man becomes a pauper
when his hankerings increase;

no one is rich or penniless when the mind is at peace. 3475

588

O Lord, in serving you,
there is no checking at the door,
no question of a proper time, no indignity or fear of villains, no feeling small or a failure.
Even so, in every way,
we still keep serving other men. 3482

MADHUSŪDANA

589

You've stopped eating, turned away from all that the senses seek;
with eyes fixed on your nose-tip and mind immersed in concentration, you are silent, as if the whole world seems to you a void.
Tell me, friend, have you become a yogini, or are you in love? 3485

37. Prayers

590

With almsgiving and pilgrimage, penance and fire ceremony, whatever will a person do who keeps within his heart the Lord, Hari, abode of felicity. 3486

591

In illness, the Lord
is the remedy supreme,
in darkness, the lamp,
in quandaries, the pathway,
the guard in dangers,
in troubles, the friend,
and in the deep ocean
of sorrow, the ship. 3494

ŚRĪ VIKRAMĀDITYA

592

I always remember
the divine child sleeping on a leaf of the fig tree, holding with his rosy hands

the rosebud of his little foot within the rose, his mouth. 3499

593

O Master, in your kindness give ear to the pleas of this wretch who has no entry and weeps outside your door. 3501

ARCHITADEVA

594

No one is more afflicted than I,
no one more merciful than you:
our coming together is well matched,
Lord, how can you not save me? 3503

595

If I am not a mighty sinner, were I not deluged by fear and cemented to the senses, what need have I to seek refuge? 3505

BHAṬṬA SUNANDANA

596

As determined by my deeds,
in every form that I am born, in each of them may my devotion to you, Hrishikeśa, steadfast be. 3508

597

Lord, I did not think of you, exalt and praise you, sing your deeds,
I did not worship you devoutly even with a blade of grass;
yet I seek your sanctuary, be merciful to me. 3514

BHĀGAVATA ŚANKHA

598

Even when the distinction disappears, O Lord,
I am yours, you are not mine:
the wave is of the ocean,
not the ocean of the wave. 3520

ŚANKARĀCHĀRYA

599

By ignorance blinded, friendless, possessed by demons of the senses, cast by inner ogres into the depths of dark delusion's well, home to all misfortunes, lost,
I weep and seek refuge in you, do not abandon me, great god,
I am afraid, assure me. 3522

600

I am in distress, miserable
at all times, in every state, I have surrendered to you, Lord, save me, who seeks your sanctuary. 3527

The Poets

The poets to whom individual verses have been ascribed are listed below in alphabetical order, with brief details where available. As some of the listed names also figure in these details, they have been marked there with an asterisk for cross-reference.

The chronological and other details given in this list are sparse and not known with finality in many cases. In almost a quarter of them we know only the poet's name, which too would have been lost but for the ascription.

In several cases poets are named with titles or honorifics. Though fully reflected in the translation, these have been left out from the list to facilitate reference. The most common honorific excluded here is bhaṭṭa, a respectful term for a learned person. Others are muni, a sage; bhadantta, a Buddhist elder; rājaputra, a prince; and śrīmad or śrī, a prefix used with names of eminent people. The title rājānaka was used in ancient Kashmir for officials of rank. Some others are explained in the endnotes.

Amaruka Reputed author of Amaruśataka, the famous collection of love poems dated c. seventh century CE. The name is also spelt Amaru.

Amritadatta Contemporary of the Kashmiri potentate Shahabuddin, c. 1352. In some entries he is titled bhāgavata, which indicates a devotee of the god Vishnu.

Amritavardhana Has the title bhāgavata, but no other detail is available.

Ānandavardhana Leading poet and thinker under King Avantivarman of ninth-century CE Kashmir. Author of Dhvanyāloka, which proposes the doctrine of dhvani or suggestion in poetry.

Architadeva Some mss. give the name as Achintadeva, and the title bhāgavata, indicating a devotee of the god Vishnu. There is no further information.

Argaṭa He is also cited in an eleventh-century commentary on the work of Rudraṭa,* but only the name is known.

Ārogya A Buddhist monk known only by name.

Aśvaghoṣa Buddhist philosopher and writer dated to the first century CE. His major work is the biographical poem Buddhacharita.

Avantivarman King of Kashmir (855–84 CE).

Baka A poet contemporary of the fifteenth-century Kashmiri king Zainu'l Abidin. Also mentioned in the continued Rājatarīnginī of Śrīvara.

Bāṇa Famous Sanskrit stylist. Court poet of King Harsha of seventh century CE Kannauj, and author of the royal biography Harshacharita and the novel Kādambari.

Bhallata A poet contemporary of King Śamkaravarman of Kashmir (883–902 CE) and the author of a sataka or century of verse epigrams.

Bhāmaha Author of the eighth-century CE work from Kashmir on poetics Kāvyālamkāra, which is the earliest extant text on the subject after Bharata's Nāṭyaśāstra.

Bhāravi Author of the epic poem Kirātārjunīya, dated to the sixth century CE Pallava empire. Lauded by later critics and cited, along with Kālidāsa,* in the 634 CE Aihole inscription.

Bhartrihari Reputed author of the well-known Śatakatrāyam, the three centuries of verse epigrams on policy (niti), pleasure (śringāra) and renunciation (vairāgya). Sometimes identified with the c. sixth–seventh century CE grammarian of the same name. A legend has him as the half-brother and predecessor of the celebrated king Vikramaditya of Ujjain.

Bhartrivāmin Identified with the seventh century CE poet Bhṭṭi, whose epic poem Rāvanavadha, apart from retelling the Rāmāyana also illustrates the poetics of Bhāmaha.* Translated into Javanese, this work helped spread the Rama story in South-East Asia.

Bhāsa Dramatist praised by famous later writers including Kālidāsa* and Bāna.* Dated usually to first–second century CE. Svapnavāsavadattā is the best known of the plays ascribed to him.

Bhaśchu Sometimes identified with the names Bharchu and Bharvu, which occur in other anthologies.

Bhaṭṭārka Only the name is known.

Bījaka Only the name is known.

Bilhaṇa Author of Vikramāṅkadeva Charita, the history of a Chālukya king of Kalyāṇa in Karnataka, and Chaurapanchaśikā, a collection of love poems. Placed in eleventh–twelfth century Kashmir.

Bodhaka Only the name is known.

Bodhisattva Only the name is known.

Brahmayaśasvāmi Only the name is known.

Chandaka Also written as ‘Chandraka’. He is mentioned by the writers Kshemendra* and Kalhaṇa,* so would have lived before the eleventh century.

Chandragopin Identified with a grammarian of this name.

Chiāka Only the name is known.

Chūlitaka Only the name is known.

Dāmodaragupta Minister of the eighth-century CE king Jayāpīda of Kashmir and author of Kuttanīmata, a novel in verse about the life of courtesans.

Dhairyamitra Only the name is known.

Dharmakīrti Celebrated Buddhist philosopher-logician dated to the seventh century CE.

Dhīranāga Author of the play Kundamālā. The name is also spelt Vīranāga or Dinnāga in some mss.

Dinnāga Eminent Buddhist philosopher, epistemologist and author, usually placed in fifth-century CE Kalinga (modern Orissa).

Dīpaka Author of the romance Vinayavati. Quoted in various anthologies.

Diviradevāditya Also mentioned as Devāditya in some mss, but only the name is known.

Govindarāja Only the name is known.

Govindasvāmi His name features in other anthologies too. In one he is shown as the joint author of a verse with Vikatanitambā.*

Harigaṇa Only the name is known.

Harsha There are two poets of this name: (1) King Harsha of Kannauj (606–46 CE), author of the plays Ratnāvali, Nāgānanda and Priyadarśikā, and patron of Bāṇa* and other poets. Some of his verses are sourced in the endnotes. (2) The twelfth-century author of the epic Naishadhīya Charita.

Harshadatta Only the name is known.

Indulekhā Only the name of this poetess is known.

Īśvaravarman Only the name is known.

Jalhaṇa Kashmiri poet, author of Somapālavilāsa. Was an official at Rājapuri, identified with modern Rajauri.

Janārdana Only the name is known.

Jayāditya Joint author with Vāmana of the well-known grammatical treatise Kāśikā Vritti.

Jayamādhava A poet only known through some anthologies.

Jayavardhana This poet figures in several anthologies, one of which describes him as a Kashmiri.

Jivaka Only the name is known.

Kalhaṇa Author of Rājatarīngini, the celebrated verse history of Kashmir, where he lived in the twelfth century.

Kālidāsa Outstanding poet and dramatist of classical Sanskrit. Often placed at the imperial Gupta court c. fifth century CE. His verses are sourced in the endnotes.

Kallaṭa Author of Spandasarvasva, a commentary on the work of his teacher Vasugupta, the Shaiva philosopher. Mentioned by Kalhaṇa* among scholar contemporaries of King Avantivarman in ninth-century CE Kashmir.

Kamalāyudha A teacher of the better-known Vākpatirāja* who praises him as such in his poetic work of the seventh century CE, Gaudavaho.

Kaviputras Two poets who wrote under a joint name. Perhaps the subjects of a laudatory reference in Kālidāsa's Mālavikāgnimitra.

Kayyāṭa There are two Kashmiri writers with this name: (1) The author of a well-known treatise on grammar, Bhāshyapradīpa, dated to c. ninth century CE; (2) A tenth-century commentator on the Deviśataka of Ānandavardhana,* who was also the grandson of Vallabhadeva,* (but not the anthologist).

Kiśoraka Also quoted in other anthologies, but only the name is known.

Krishna Miśra Author of the twelfth-century play Prabodhachandrodaya.

Kshemendra Well-known poet, critic and polymath from eleventh-century Kashmir. Some of his verses are sourced in the endnotes.

Kumāra It has been suggested that this is the same as the blind poet Kumāradāsa, author of the seventh-century CE epic poem Jānakiharāṇa, much lauded by later critics.

Laulaka Sometimes identified as the grandfather of Jonarāja, a contemporary of King Zainu'l Abidin of Kashmir and author of the historical work Rājāvali.

Madhusūdana Only the name is known.

Māgha Author of the sixth–seventh century CE epic poem Śiśupālavadha, much praised by later critics.

Mahāmanushya A poet cited in some anthologies, in one of which he is described as from Kashmir.

Mangalavatsa Only the name is known.

Mātanga Divākara Poet at the court of King Harsha of seventhcentury CE Kannauj. Cited by the later critic Rājaśekhara* as a peer of Bāṇa.*

Mātrigupta A poet in Kashmir, mentioned by Kalhaṇa* and quoted by Kshemendra.*

Mātrishenā Only the name is known.

Maya Only the name is known.

Mayūra Father-in-law of Bāṇa,* and author of the poem Sūryaśataka.

Morikā A poetess known only from some anthologies.

Muktāpīḍ King of Kashmir c. 594 CE.

Muktikoshtaka Only the name is known.

Nagnajita The same name is mentioned by the astronomer Varāhamihira as an authority on statuary.

Nārāyaṇa Author of the celebrated seventhcentury CE epic poem Veṇīsamhāra.

Narendra Only the name is known.

Nidrādaridra He is also cited in other anthologies, but nothing is known beyond the name.

Paribhūta Only the name is known.

Parpaṭi Only the name is known.

Phalguhastini This poetess is known only by name through two entries in the anthology.

Prabhākarananda Only the name is known.

Prakāśadatta Nothing known beyond the name.

Prakāśavarsha Has twenty-seven entries in the full anthology, but little is known about him. The c. ninth-century commentator Vallabhadeva* mentions him as his teacher, and he also features in other anthologies.

Pulina Only the name is known.

Puṇya Nothing known beyond the name.

Rāhulaka A poet also quoted in other anthologies, but only the name is known.

Rājaśekhara Well-known critic, poet and dramatist from tenth-century Kannauj, often quoted in anthologies. Author of the plays Karpūramanjarī and Viddhasālābhanjikā, the verse Bālarāmāyana, and Kāvya Mimāṃsā, a treatise on poetics.

Randānanda Only the name is known.

Ratnabhūti Only the name is known.

Ratnamitra Only the name is known.

Ravidatta A poet quoted in several anthologies, but only the name is known.

Ravigupta Buddhist philosopher of eighth century CE, quoted in > various anthologies. Author of Chandraprabhā-vijaya Kāvya and other works.

Rudraṭa Author of a treatise on poetics, Kāvyālamkāra, dated c. tenth century. Not to be confused with Bhāmaha.*

Śankarāchārya The great Vedānta philosopher usually dated to the eighth century CE, and author of some well-known devotional poetry.

Śankha Only the name is known. The title indicates a devotee of the god Vishnu.

Śankuka Mentioned in Rājatarīnginī of Kalhaṇa* as the author of an epic poem, Bhuvanābhyudaya, and contemporary of King Ajitapīḍa of Kashmir (c. 813 CE).

Śaśivardhana Perhaps an associate of King Kalaśaka of Kashmir (1080–88 CE). One verse in the present anthology is ascribed jointly to both.

Śilā Bhattārikā Ninth-century CE poetess known only through anthologies.

Śridatta Only the name is known.

Subhadra A poetess lauded by Rajaśekhara* in another anthology.

Śūdraka Author of the play Mricchakaṭika, well known in English translation as The Little Clay Cart. Dated to c. second-third century CE.

Śuga The titles indicate a high official, of whom only the name is known.

Sunandana Only the name is known.

Sūra Well-known Buddhist poet of c. fourth century CE. Author of the Jātakamālā, which was later translated into Chinese and Tibetan. Also known as ārya Śūra.

Śuravarman Only the name is known.

Tathāgatendra Simha Only the name is known.

Trivikrama Author of the prose–verse narrative Nalachampu, also quoted by Kshemendra.*

Uchyamānānanda Only the name is known.

Udaya Only the name is known from the single entry in the anthology. The title upādhyāya indicates a teacher.

Udbhaṭa Poet and critic at the court of King Jayapīḍ of Kashmir (779–813 CE). Author of Kāvyālamkāra Samgraha, a treatise on poetics.

Vākpati Author of the Prakrit epic Gaudavaho, but the reference here to being the son of Harsha makes the identification problematic.

Vallabhadeva There are two writers with this name from Kashmir: a ninth-century CE commentator on the Śiśupālavadha of Māgha,* and the fifteenth-century compiler of the present anthology. The latter has shown twenty-two entries under this name.

Vālmiki Known in tradition as the ādi kavi or the first poet, and the author of the Rāmāyaṇa. This epic poem is ascribed to 400–200 BCE.

Varāhamihira Well-known sixth-century CE astronomer, whose verses are also quoted in anthologies.

Vararuchi A poet and grammarian cited in some anthologies as the author of Kanthābharaṇam.

Vibhūtibala The name alone is known from a single entry in the anthology.

Vidyādhīpati This name has been identified as a title of Ratnākara, a poet at the court of King Avantivarman of Kashmir (855–84 CE), and the author of the epic Haravijaya, who is mentioned in Rājatarīnginī of Kaṇha.*

Vijjākā Sanskrit poetess known only from various anthologies. References in her verses place her between 650 and 850 CE. Also known as Vidyā.

Vikaṭanītibā Ninth-century CE poetess, acclaimed by the later critic Rajaśekhara.*

Vikramāditya Possibly associated with the better-known Kashmiri poet Mēnta, with whom he is shown as the co-author of some verses in other anthologies. Mentioned in Rājatarīnginī of Kalhaṇa.

Viśākhadeva Identified with Viśākhadatta, author of the c. eighth-century CE play Mudrārākṣha.

Viṭa Vritta The name alone is known from a single entry in the anthology.

Vriddhi Also mentioned as Śaka Vriddhi, which may be an indicator of his ethnic background.

Vrishnigupta Only the name is known.

Vyāghraṇa Only the name is known.

Vyāsa The traditional author of the Mahābhārata. The kernel of this long epic poem is believed to have been composed c. fifth century BCE.

Notes

Introduction

- 1 Among the better known are Subhāshitaratnakosha of Vidyākara (Bengal, c. eleventh century); Saduktikarṇāmrita of Śrīdharadāsa (Bengal, 1205); Sūktimuktāvali of Jalhaṇa (Deccan, 1258); and Paddhati of Śārṅgadhara (Rajasthan, 1363), apart from the work discussed here. A modern compilation in the same tradition is Subhāshita-ratnabhāndāgāra of N.R. Acharya (Mumbai, 1952). Only the first mentioned of these anthologies has an English translation (by D.H.H. Ingalls, Harvard Oriental Series, vol. 44).
- 2 The best known of these are the Śatakas of Bhartrihari and Amaruka, both perhaps c. seventh century. The first has the themes of niti (policy), Śringāra (pleasure) and vairāgya (renunciation), while the second has only erotic poems. Padyāvali of Rupa Gosvāmin, sixteenth century, is a collection of devotional verses.
- 3 See 1 above. A fuller list of both types is given in S. Bhattacharjis article on anthologies in Glimpses of Sanskrit Literature, ed. A.N.D. Haksar, New Delhi, 1995.
- 4 M. Winternitz, History of Indian Literature, vol. 3, tr. S. Jha, Delhi, 1963; A.B. Keith, A History of Sanskrit Literature, Oxford University Press, 1920. Hereafter referred to as Winternitz and Keith.
- 5 Winternitz.
- 6 P. Peterson, notes to his edition of Subhāshitāvali, mentioned in the Introduction.
- 7 Winternitz. Keith. A.K. Warder, Indian Kāvya Literature, vols. 2–7, Delhi 1990–2004. J. Brough, Poems from the Sanskrit, London, 1968.
- 8 For example v. 1253 in the original, the first line of which reads in Sanskrit: sa me samāsamo māso sā me māsasamā samā. This describes the lovers feelings when the beloved is absent or present. An English rendering would be a month is like a year for me, a year is like a month, but the impact, which derives from the alliterative use of only two consonants in the line, in words meaning month (māsa) and year (samā), is lost in translation.

9 D.H.H. Ingalls, Sanskrit Poetry, Harvard University Press, 1965.

10 Subhāshitaratnakosha, ed. D.D. Kosambi and V.V. Gokhale, Harvard Oriental Series, vol. 42, Harvard University Press, 1957.

Anthology

Several deities from the Hindu pantheon are mentioned in the verses. Sharada is another name for Sarasvati, goddess of learning, speech and the arts, with an important shrine in Kashmir. The trinity of Brahma, Vishnu and Shiva, the great gods associated with creation, preservation and dissolution, is well known. The second, also called Hari, is invoked in his various incarnations, notably as Krishna, whose childhood with his foster-mother Yashodā, was extolled with deep devotion. The other incarnations of Vishnu described here are as the divine boar, who recued the earth from the deluge, and the great tortoise, on whose back was placed the mountain used by the gods and the demons to churn the ocean of milk. Lakshmi, the goddess of prosperity, is Vishnus consort and rests with him on a serpent couch in the ocean. Shiva is often addressed here as Shambhu, giver of peace and happiness. Guha, here depicted as an artless infant, is his son. So is Ganapati, the elephant-headed god who removes obstacles. Indra or Shakra is the king of heaven. Manmatha and Madana are other names for Kama, god of love and symbol of desire. Hrishikeśa is an epithet of Vishnu and Krishna.

Many of the notes on the numbered individual verses refer to their sources as known to present scholarship. Those occurring more frequently in this selection are indicated by abbreviations, shown within brackets as follows. Amaruśataka (A); Bhartriharis Nīti, Śringāra and Vairāgya Śatakatrayam (B); Hitopadeśa (H); Kirātārjunīya of Bhāravi (K); Mahābhārata (M); Panchatantra (P); Rāmāyana (R); and Siśupālavadha of Māgha (S).

The opening verse of B Śatakatrayam.

Also vv. 19 and 20. See general note above for the boar incarnation.

The opening verse of Harshacharita by Bāṇa, court poet of King Harsha.

This commemorative verse refers to the preceding v. 15.

Nothing is known about the person or the work named.

A popular description of Krishna as a little boy, from Krishnakarṇāmrita by Lilāshuka Bilvamangala, c. eleventh century.

The boy Krishna lifted up a hill to protect the cattle from the rain. See v. 24.

From Bhāgavata Purāṇa, XII. 13.2. See general note above for the tortoise incarnation.

From Nalachampu, 1.5, of Trivikrama Bhaṭṭa.

The verse occurs in Kāvya-mīmāṃsā of Rājaśekhara.

cf. note 7.

H, 1. 134. Vv. 47, 49, 52 are also from the same source.

From the poets Jātakamālā, 11.18 54 B, Nīti. 74, with minor variation.

From Śabdakalpadruma of Udbhaṭa.

From Deśopadeśa, 1.17, of Kshemendra.

Rājatarangini, 3.309.

B, Nīti. 3.

K, 14.24.

B, Nīti. 5.

P, 2.33. The sages named are well known in the history of Indian thought.

Also found with slight changes in P, 5.38; H, 1.71; and Chanakya Nitiśāstra, 1.69. The last line still remains a popular saying.

B, Nīti. 24, and H, P. 14.

H, 1. 176

H, 1.1/0.

Nāgānanda, IV. 51.

B, Nīti.72.

This is the thorny desert plant Capparis aphylla.

Shami is the plant Mimosa suma whose hardwood was used to kindle ritual fires.

The ruler Shahabuddin is dated c. 1352 CE by Peterson.

H, 2.19.

B, Nīti. 23.

Line 2 gives the literal meaning of khadyota, the Sanskrit word for firefly.

See note to 108.

P, 3.46.

The sandalwood trees fragrance was traditionally supposed to attract snakes. Khadira is the thorny hardwood tree Acacia catechu.

A, 163.

A, 43.

A, 15.

A, 70.

The first two lines of the original are the same as R, Yuddha. 5.6.

R, Yuddha. 5. 10 with minor variation.

From Hanumannāṭaka (5.25), a c. ninth-century CE play by Dāmodara Miśra.

R. Yuddha. 5.13, with minor variation.

Nāgānanda, I.

B, Śringāra. 42.

B, Śringāra. 54.

The poets Abhijnānaśākuntala, III. 22.

Chaurapanchaśikā, 12.

Abhijnānaśākuntala, II. 10.

Ascribed to the poetess Mārulā in the anthology Sūktimuktāvali, cf. note 1 to the Introduction.

A, 4.

192 A, 56.

K, 9.43.

The eyes are compared to indīvara, the blue lily. Also in v. 213.

A, 146.

A, 18.

A, 39.

Ascribed to Kumāradāsa in the anthology Śārṅgadhara Paddhati, cf. note 1 to the Introduction. But also at A, 57.

A, 69.

Naishadhīya-charita, 3.163 of Harsha.

The poets Ritusamhāra 6. 20.

Ritusamhāra, 1.13. The snake and the peacock are mortal enemies in tradition.

Mrichhakatika of Śūdraka, V. 16.

ibid. V. 14.

B, Śringāra. 92.

R, Kishkindhā. 30.58.

Vikramāṅkadevacharita, 16.14.

The poets Kumārasambhava, 8.57.

Ratnāvali, III. 6.

Haravijaya, 19.5 of Ratnākara.

Kumārasambhava, 8.63.

An example of verse-capping. The first two lines are a statement by the lover and the rest a repartee by his inamorata. In tradition Bilhana loved a princess, and though the verse is ascribed to both, it is not found in the poets work.

Nalachampu, 7.31.

A, 71. A well-known verse.

S, 10. 28.

S, 7.61.

Raghuvamśa, 16.65 of Kālidāsa. Nāgānanda, III. 35.

Kāvyaḷamkāra, 7. 71.

K, 9.50.

Almost the same as A, 23.

Bhaṭṭikāvya (Rāvaṇavadha), 9.21 318 A, 101.

S. 11.

Viddhaśālabhanjika, I. 12.

Almost the same as A, 16.

Āruka is identified in Monier-Williams Sanskrit–English dictionary as the fruit of a Himalayan plant (peach?) and Kīna as people in Kashmir.

The turasi plant is unidentified.

By Rajaśekhara. Verse I. 48. It addresses the legendary supports of the earin and refers to Kamas feat of breaking Shivas bow.

S, 2.46.

K, 11. 61.

Kalāvilāsa, 9.6, of Kshemendra.

Narmamala, 3.33, of Kshemendra.

Samaya Mātrikā, 4.23, of Kshemendra.

The satiric reference is to the ritual confirmation of a fee or gift by the donor pouring water on the hand of the recipient.

From the poets Kuṭṭanimite, 399.

ibid. 822.

The title cited is bhaṭṭa. The possible implication is that its priestly bearer has twice the negative qualities of the others like the rustic etc. mentioned in the verse, and also frequents prostitutes.

The last item refers to the subhāshita verse, highly prized and sometimes plagiarized.

The poets title means goldsmith, perhaps a professional indication.

V. 2364 also occurs in Kalāvitasa, 8.11, by Kshemendra.

See general note. The allusion is to the churning of the milky ocean, made possible by the god Vishnu, here called Krishna. Baka has over twenty citations and was perhaps the anthologists near-contemporary.

The verse refers to Sultan Zainul Abidin and helps to date the work.

This and v. 431 are taken from Rājendrakarṇapūra, an eulogy of the eleventh-century Kashmiri king Harshadeva by Śambhu.

M, Udyoga. 39.64.

M, Śānti. 140.23.

H, P.29. The thought is countered in v. 448.

M, Adi. 88.12.

H, 1.210.

H, P. 30.

M, Śānti. 140.24.

H, P. 17.

M, Adi. 140.82. H, 4.12.

M, Sānti. 8.19. H, 1.124.

Manusmṛiti, 4.119.

P, 4.10.

M, Udyoga. 35.56-57.

M, Udyoga. 36.30 478 P, 4.28.

Prabodhachandrodaya, II.1 of Krishna Miśra.

M, Śānti. 181.16.

M, Śānti. 331.41

B, Nīti. 84, with slight change.

B, Vairāgya. 97.

B, Nīti. 82.

H, 2.83.

P, 5.65.

Also quoted in Rājatarīngini of Kalhaṇa as from this author.

In Rāmāyana the hero Ramas wife was abducted while he had gone hunting for the golden deer.

Another example of statement and repartee, as in v. 271.

The poets Sevyasevakopadeśa, v.54.

Ascribed to Vyāsa in Auchitya Vichāra Charchā of Kshemendra.

The same as Bhagavadgītā 2.27 except for one word.

H, 1.165.

M, Śānti. 184.15. H, 4.74.

Prabodhachandrodaya, I.29.

Bhagavadgītā, 2.61-62.

M, Adi. 75.50.

The ascription is wishful as the two poets lived at different times. The verse is found at B, Śringāra. 51.

B, Śringāra. 78, with slight change. Also ascribed in Auchitya Vichāra Charchā of Kshemendra to Chandaka.

B, Vairāgya. 12. Vikramacharita, J.R. 16.3. The ascription seems incorrect.

B, Vairāgya. 7.

Ibid. 46.

Ibid. 89.

M, Vana. 117. The ascription seems incorrect.

Also at B, Śringāra. 39.

Also at B, Nīti. 45.

P, 1.111. H, 1.146.

The rendition of some verses sourced to H is taken from the translators translation of The Hitopadeśa of Nārāyaṇa (Penguin India, 1998).

PENGUIN BOOKS

Published by the Penguin Group

Penguin Books India Pvt. Ltd, 11 Community Centre, Panchsheel Park, New Delhi 110 017, India

Penguin Group (USA) Inc., 375 Hudson Street, New York, New York 10014, USA

Penguin Group (Canada), 90 Eglinton Avenue East, Suite 700, Toronto, Ontario M4P 2Y3, Canada (a division of Pearson Penguin Canada Inc.)

Penguin Books Ltd, 80 Strand, London WC2R 0RL, England

Penguin Ireland, 25 St Stephen's Green, Dublin 2, Ireland (a division of Penguin Books Ltd)

Penguin Group (Australia), 707 Collins Street, Melbourne, Victoria 3008, Australia (a division of Pearson Australia Group Pty Ltd)

Penguin Group (NZ), 67 Apollo Drive, Rosedale, Auckland 0632, New Zealand (a division of Pearson New Zealand Ltd)

Penguin Books (South Africa) (Pty) Ltd, Block D, Rosebank Office Park, 181 Jan Smuts Avenue, Parktown North, Johannesburg 2193, South Africa

Penguin Books Ltd, Registered Offices: 80 Strand, London WC2R 0RL, England

First published by Penguin Books India 2007

Copyright © A.N.D. Haksar 2007

Cover: Detail from Kandariya Mahadev temple dedicated to Shiva (11th century)

(© 2006 shunya.net)

All rights reserved

ISBN: 978-0-143-10136-9

This digital edition published in 2013.

e-ISBN: 978-8-184-75735-4

This book is sold subject to the condition that it shall not, by way of trade or otherwise, be lent, resold, hired out, or otherwise circulated without the publisher's prior written consent in any form of binding or cover other than that in which it is published and without a similar condition including this condition being imposed on the subsequent purchaser and without limiting the rights under copyright reserved above, no part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in or introduced into a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means (electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise), without the prior written permission of both the copyright owner and the above-mentioned publisher of this book.